[1] Under its charter the city has assumed the duty of operating a water system for the purpose of supplying water to its inhabitants. In the performance of this duty it acts, not in its sovereign capacity, but in the capacity of a private corporation engaged in like business. Appeal of Brumm (Pa.) 12 Atl. 855; Linne v. Bredes, 43 Wash. 540, 86 Pac. 858, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 707, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1068, 11 Ann. Cas. 238; Wyman, Public Service Corp., vol. 1, p. 187. Like a private corporation, it is the duty of the city to furnish without discrimination to all its inhabitants who apply therefor a supply of water upon such applicants complying with such reasonable rules and regulations as it may lawfully establish for the conduct of the business.

[2] The question is whether or not the provision upon the authority of which respondents base their refusal to supply the water is, in the absence of any statute authorizing the same, a reasonable regulation. Respondents have directed our attention to a number of cases wherein provisions similar to the one under discussion have been upheld. From an examination thereof it appears that in all the cases cited there existed a statute upon the authority of which the provision was enacted. See Howe v. City of Orange, 70 N. J. Eq. 648, 62 Atl. 777; Appeal of Brumm, supra; City of Atlanta v. Burton, 90 Ga. 486, 16 S. E. 214. Where such right is conferred by statute or the organic law of the city, it can, of course, be asserted and enforced by ordinance embodying such rules and regulations. The city charter contains nothing touching the subject, and the general statutes of the state are silent in conferring such power. This being the case, the authority to enact the provision under discussion, if it exists at all, is by virtue of the general incidental power of the municipality. The provisions of ordinances enacted under such implied power must be reasonably necessary to carry out the express powers conferred, and not inconsistent with the laws or policy of the state. Ex parte Green, 94 Cal. 387, 29 Pac. 783; Egan v. City of San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576, 133 Pac. 294. The ordinance fixing the rules and regulations provides that:

> "All rates, except meter rates, are due and payable in advance, and meter rates are due and payable at the end of the month, excepting that a deposit may be required thereon in an amount not exceeding the estimated quantity of water consumed."

It appears the water was supplied to the former occupant of the premises in question by meter, and therefore the rates were not due until the expiration of the month. But under the provision just quoted the city could have exacted a deposit in an amount equal to the estimated value of the quantity of water to be supplied, thus fully protecting itself against loss. It is therefore an unnecessary regulation, and as applied to petitioner, unreasonable in that, while he is not in arrears for any water furnished to him or supplied to another upon his order, it is nevertheless insisted that he pay the debt of another as a prerequisite condition to the city performing its duty to supply water to all its inhabitants without discrimination, and for a like reason is discriminatory against petitioner. While respondents do not seek directly to enforce payment of the charge against the property, they do, in withholding a legal right and by thus destroying the use of the property as a habitation, indirectly seek to compel petitioner to pay such charge. In addition to the authorities cited by respondents, wherein the validity of the provision here attacked was upheld by reason of statutory authority, they have cited the cases of Jones v. Mayor, 109 Tenn. 550, 72 S. W. 985, and Sheward v. Citizens' Water Co., 90 Cal. 635, 27 Pac. 439. These cases are clearly distinguished from that at bar by reason of the fact that the applicant for water was himself in arrears and had made default in payment for water which had been theretofore supplied to him. Our conclusion is that the regulation in question is unreasonable in that, without statutory authority therefor, it makes one person liable for the debts of another and contravenes the duty assumed by the city to serve all its inhabitants without discrimination. This view is sustained by overwhelming authority. See Chicago v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 218 Ill. 40, 75 N. E. 803, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 770; Turner v. Revere Water Co., 171 Mass. 329, 50 N. E. 634, 40 L. R. A. 657, 68 Am. St. Rep. 432; Linne v. Bredes, 43 Wash. 540, 86 Pac. 858, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 707, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1068, 11 Ann. Cas. 238; City of Houston v. Lockwood Inv. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 144 S. W. 685; Harbison v. Knoxville Water Co. (Tenn. Ch.) 53 S. W. 995, 56 L. R. A. 316, 76 Am. St. Rep. 682.

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court instructed to render judgment awarding petitioner a peremptory writ of mandate as prayed for.

PEOPLE v. HAIL. (Cr. 247.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 1060*)—Appeal—Objection Below—Argument of Counsel.

Improper argument of the district attorney, presented by a record showing objection preserved, may be reviewed on appeal, where the trial court has refused to heed the objection, though no other ruling was invoked below as to such argument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1060.*]

2. Criminal Law (§ 1171*) — Appeal — Ground for Reversal — Argument of Counsel.

A statement by the district attorney in his argument that, should the jury acquit accused, they would be afraid to go out on the street and meet their fellow men, required a reversal of a conviction of manslaughter, where the evidence left in doubt the question of guilt.

3. Criminal Law (§ 700*)—Conduct of Prosecuting Attorney—Nature of Duties.

A public prosecutor represents all the people, including a person being prosecuted for crime, and should see that such person is not deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

A prosecuting attorney should in his argument remain strictly within the record, and not attempt to evolve any theory or to import into the case any features not reasonably justified by the proofs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

F. G. Hail was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jas. M. Hanley, of San Francisco, and L. N. Peter and W. W. Kellogg, both of Quincy, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of manslaughter under an information filed in the superior court of Plumas county charging him with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed at Quincy, in said county, on the 16th day of August, 1913, prosecutes these appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The assignments of error are numerous, and may be stated in orderly sequence as follows: (1) That the evidence does not support the verdict; (2) that the court erred in certain rulings whereby certain evidence was admitted and certain evidence excluded; (3) that the district attorney, during the trial of the cause and in his argument to the jury, was guilty of misconduct seriously prejudicing the substantial rights of the accused; (4) that, in its charge, the court misdirected the jury in matters of law; (5) newly discovered evidence, etc., etc.

In view of the conclusion we have reached that the judgment must be set aside on the ground of substantial prejudice suffered by the defendant by reason of certain remarks by the district attorney in his argument to the jury, it will be unnecessary to notice the other assignments. A consideration of the point which we conceive demands a reversal of the judgment and the order will, however, necessitate a somewhat extended review of the evidence. The voluminousness of the evidence adduced at the trial, and which, in its entirety, constitutes a part of the record on these appeals, may at once be apprehended when it is stated that 45 witnesses were called, gave testimony and most of them subjected to exhaustive cross-examination. It would, therefore, be impossible, in the examination of the evidence, to consider and review in this opinion in full detail the testimony of each of the witnesses. Indeed, since there appears to be, upon the face of the testimony, little or no material conflict therein, with perhaps an exception or two upon certain points, to which it will be our duty to direct attention, it is deemed necessary only to present here an accurate synoptical statement of the facts which logically follow from the evidence, now and then, as in our judgment the necessity of this decision may require, briefly quoting certain testimony.

The defendant, at the time of the homicide, was 62 years of age, and a journalist by profession, having been, up to the time of the unfortunate affair of which this case is the outgrowth, continuously engaged, for a period exceeding 30 years, in the business of publishing and editing newspapers in Plumas county.

The deceased, John H. Boyle, was a lawyer by profession, and was, and had been for several years prior and up to the time of his death, engaged in prosecuting the practice thereof at Quincy, the county seat of said county. He was, at the time mentioned, about 35 years of age, in stature measured 5 feet 9¾ inches, and in robust health.

It appears that, approximately a year prior to the date of the homicide, the deceased had made an application to the Masonic lodge of Quincy to become a member thereof, and that, upon considering and voting upon said application, said lodge rejected it, and thus denied the deceased the privilege of becoming affiliated therewith. The result of the action of said lodge upon his application was, quite naturally, a sore disappointment to Boyle, and it seems provoked in him an intense feeling of hostility and resentment against all the members of said lodge in general and in particular against the individual, whoever he might be, whose vote upon the application had resulted in its rejection. According to the undisputed evidence, he, on indiscriminate occasions, bitterly denounced the members of the lodge collectively, referring to them in language scurrilous and opprobrious in the extreme. He let it be understood in no uncertain language that he would in some manner avenge the wrong which he conceived had been committed against him by the denial to him of the privilege of entering into membership of the Masonic fraternity, if he could succeed in discovering the identity of the member of the local lodge of that order who had cast the "blackball" against his application. He appears to have started an investigation looking to the disclosure of the identity of the individual who thus had prevented his acceptance into the lodge, and kept up a relentless prosecution of it until he had obtained information, sufficient to him, upon which to base the belief that the defendant was the party who had cast the vote fatal to his hope of becoming a member of the lodge. Whether he had any tangible ground upon which to found his belief or suspicion, or whether he had obtained satisfactory evidence that the defendant was the party who cast the "blackball" on his application, it is very evident that he in good faith believed that the accused cast the vote which obstructed his admission into the lodge; for it appears that, for a period of approximately nine months prior to his fatal meeting with the defendant, he repeatedly accused the latter of having been responsible for the rejection of his application, and had repeatedly referred to him in the most abusive and violent language, and threatened to get even, or, as some of the witnesses put it, declared that he would "get him." Shortly after he had been rejected as an applicant to membership of the lodge, the deceased met the defendant, and at once entered upon a discussion of the fact of his rejection, asking the latter if he was present at the lodge meeting at which his (deceased's) petition was considered and acted upon. The defendant replied that he was at said meeting; whereupon the deceased denounced the man who "blackballed" him as a "son of a bitch," and added, in great anger and vehemence, "that he would continue to hunt the son of a bitch that blackballed him, and when he found him he would get him."

Later—about six weeks or two months previously to the date of the tragedy—the deceased again saw and met the defendant, this time in the corridor of the courthouse. Of this meeting the defendant testified: "Mr. Boyle came rapidly behind me and accosted me, leaning his elbow on the post or railing, and, looking straight at me, in a menacing manner, said: 'Mr. Hail, will you deny to me that you cast that blackball against me?'" To which Hail answered: "John, I will neither deny it nor affirm it, as I have already told you." And thereupon Hail hastily left the deceased and went up the stairs of the courthouse.

For some time prior to the day on which the fatal shooting occurred, Hail had at various times been told by different parties that the deceased had reached the conclusion that he (Hail) had cast the "blackball" against the former; that the deceased was constantly abusing the defendant in severe and scurrilous terms and that he had made threats against Hail.

We are now brought to the day of the homicide, some of the immediate circumstances of which will be the better understood by the following preliminary explanation: It appears that, during the course of the agitation over the rejection of the petition of the deceased to become a member of the Masonic lodge, an article, anonymously signed, was published in the News, a newspaper published at Greenville, in Plumas county. It further appears that, subsequently to the publication of said article, a certain editorial was printed in the National-Bulletin, a newspaper published and edited by the defendant at Quincy. There is nothing in the record from which the character and the specific subject-matter of said articles can definitely be ascertained or determined. It is, however, fairly and reasonably inferable from the whole record and the references in the testimony to said articles that the one printed in the News contained an acrimonious discussion of the action of the Masonic lodge in rejecting the petition of the deceased, and perhaps an insinuation that the defendant was responsible for said action, and a severe arraignment of him therefor, and that the article published in the National-Bulletin was a reply thereto, and, while not referring by name to the author of the article appearing in the News (doubtless for the reason that his identity was not certainly known to the defendant), severely (it is to be apprehended) anathematized the latter and his article. At all events, it is clearly manifest from the testimony that the News article was exceedingly offensive to the defendant and that the latter's article greatly offended and was resented by the deceased, he having been persuaded, at least in some measure, that the strictures contained in said last-mentioned article, whatever they might have been, were aimed at him. With this explanation, we will return to the day of the tragedy. Between half past 7 and 8 o'clock of the evening of August 16, 1913, the defendant and one Edward Huskinson were holding a conversation near the outer edge of the sidewalk, in front of what is known as the "Capitol Saloon," located on Main street, in Quincy; the defendant, it appears, standing on the ground, or not quite upon the sidewalk, but near the curbing. They had thus been engaged for a very brief period of time ("probably a minute, maybe two," so Huskinson thought), when the deceased put in an appearance, and, approaching the spot where the two men were standing, and with "a little wild, a little, glitter in his eye, under subdued excitement," addressed the defendant saying: "Mr. Hail, I would like to see you a minute." Hail, thereupon, and without making a reply to the deceased, immediately "turned around and hastily stepped up on the sidewalk and started uptown past the barber shop. Mr. Boyle turned and followed; headed him off in front of the barber shop." Huskinson testified that, at that juncture, he "started across the sidewalk towards the Capitol (saloon). Just as I got to the swinging doors," he continued, "I thought I heard something like a slap and immediately followed by the words, 'You son of a bitch.' I turned around and saw Mr. Boyle backing down the sidewalk and Mr. Hail following him. Mr. Hail had an open pocketknife in his hand and as Mr. Boyle backed off the sidewalk, I jumped in between them. I said, 'For Christ sake, Johnny, cut this out,' or, 'Let's have none of this.' At that I looked at his hand and found there was nothing in that, but his hands were clasped—clinched. Then I turned around and Mr. Hail was gone. I asked Mr. Boyle, 'What has become of Hail?' He says, 'He has gone after his gun—by G——d, I will be here when he comes back.'" Huskinson and Boyle, after the departure of Hail, stepped up on the sidewalk, and Huskinson asked Boyle what he had done. The latter replied that he had asked Hail "if he meant that article" for him, that Hail returned an affirmative answer, and that he (Boyle) thereupon slapped Hail's face.

Hail's version of the first meeting between the deceased and himself is as follows: That he was on his way to the Masonic hall carrying with him a written invitation from the board of education to the Masonic lodge to conduct the ceremonies of laying the corner stone of a new high school building in Quincy, the construction of which was then in progress; that he met Huskinson at the point above mentioned, and paused to tell him of said invitation, and, while so engaged, "Boyle came up and took a position on the sidewalk between Huskinson and myself. With a jerk of the head and a fierce, menacing expression on his face, he said: 'Mr. Hail, I would like to speak to you a minute as soon as you are through with Mr. Huskinson.' I made no reply, and started to go down the street past the Grand Central Hotel and post office to the Masonic building. Mr. Boyle followed me, and, as I was about to step up on the sidewalk, he accosted me again, and said, 'Parties tell me that article in the paper meant me.' I made no reply other than to say, 'That is up to you, John.' As quick as I got the words 'That is up to you, John,' out of my mouth, he struck me a heavy blow on the left side of my head and ear with his right hand, accompanying the blow with the words, 'You son of a bitch.' He also called me a black bastard. I jumped up on the sidewalk, told him he was a dirty coward, and moved westward past a post and a tree or trees. I knew he was a young man, 35 years of age, active and powerful, and that I was an old man of 62 and in a weakened condition. I therefore knew that I had no show with him in a physical contest. As I passed westward of the post and tree or trees, I quickly took from my pocket a small penknife and opened it. I did this, not for the purpose of assaulting Mr. Boyle, but for the purpose of warding off and preventing him from making an attack upon my life, as he had previously threatened. * * * During the latter part of this trouble Mr. Huskinson was on the sidewalk at my right, by words and acts trying to stop the trouble. Mr. Huskinson's efforts gave me an opportunity to escape from a disgraceful street brawl, and possibly prevented another assault upon my life, and I did so."

After the departure of Hail from the scene of the assault above described, Huskinson remained for a while with Boyle and undertook to persuade him to drop the matter and to leave that part of the street. Huskinson's expostulations were unavailing, and, saying to the deceased, "Well, Johnny, if you ain't going, I am; for Heaven's sake don't have any trouble," he walked into the Capitol saloon.

With the exception of a child just past the age of eight years, Albert Vance by name, who said that he saw Boyle slap Hail a severe blow and the latter with a knife in his hand attempting to stab the former, although the two men, he said, were never close to each other after Boyle struck Hail, the only witnesses to the first altercation between the defendant and the deceased were Huskinson, Boyle, and Hail. There was no material variance between the testimony of Huskinson and that of Hail relating to the circumstances of the original actual hostile meeting of the parties, and it is hence manifest that the testimony of these witnesses detailing said circumstances stands in the record undisputed. Thus the proposition is obvious that the deceased was the original aggressor or the first to precipitate actual hostilities.

It now remains to be seen what the evidence discloses relative to the subsequent events which finally led to the fatal shooting. As seen, the defendant left the scene of the first difficulty immediately after Huskinson stepped in and stopped the further progress of the altercation. The testimony shows, and, in fact, the defendant declared it to be true on the witness stand, that, forthwith upon the cessation of the first trouble, he started for and went to his office. What he did there and of his movements thereafter up to and including the time of the shooting may best be told in his own language, inasmuch as his is the only testimony disclosed by the record bearing upon certain incidents occurring after the original difficulty and immediately connected with the final chapter of the tragedy. He testified:

"I entered the office and went back to the editorial room, turning on the electric light with my hand and handkerchief, and examined my head and ear to see if they were bloody. I found no blood. I then reached down into a drawer of my desk and took therefrom a pistol and put it in my right front pants pocket, for the purpose of defending myself against an assault by him should he make it again that evening in accordance with threats previously made. I left my office and resumed my journey to the Masonic lodge. I was going to the Masonic lodge for the specific purpose already referred to—that of delivering the resolution adopted by the board of education to the secretary of the lodge. Near the west line of Mr. Stone's jewelry store I observed Mrs. B. Schneider coming across the street from the Plumas House. She hailed me she said to have a talk with me. I told her I was in a hurry at that time and could not do so, but that I would be glad to do so on a future occasion. She signified her assent and I resumed my journey to the Masonic lodge. The Masonic lodge, while I think the rule is 7:30, in the summer months, it seldom meets before 8 o'clock—usually about that time. I was hurrying to get there before lodge opened and deliver this document to the secretary. Q. What course did you pursue along the street after talking to Mrs. Barney Schneider? A. I went along the sidewalk on the north side of Main street. Q. What is your usual course and what had been your accustomed course in going to the Masonic lodge? A. To go down by the way of the National Bulletin office and Main street. (This course would require the defendant to pass the point where the deceased made his first assault upon Hail.) Q. After leaving Mrs. Schneider, going along Main street, did you know whether or not John Boyle, the deceased, would be upon the street that night? A. I didn't know positively that he would be on the street; yet I was afraid that he might be."

"I did not expect to meet him, for the reasons I have indicated, but of course I did not know but I might meet him, especially as to reach the Masonic lodge I was compelled to go near his residence, which is next door. When I reached a point near the east line of the Ford & Lee Company's grocery store, I glanced up ahead of me and saw Mr. Boyle partially crouched and hidden behind a post near the scene of the former trouble. Mr. Boyle had his right leg thrown back and his right hand at his hip pocket. I changed my course of travel from the center of the sidewalk to one near the walls of the building on the opposite side of the sidewalk from where Mr. Boyle stood. When I got to a point probably a couple feet west of him he suddenly sprang from his position behind the post on to me and with some epithet struck me a heavy blow on the left side of the head with his fist. The effect of the blow was to daze me. When I found myself recovering from the condition mentioned I found Mr. Boyle clinching with me and myself endeavoring to draw my pistol. It was at that time that I heard two shots fired in rapid succession. At least it so seemed to me. I was confident Mr. Boyle had fired for the purpose of taking my life, as threatened. The second shot entered my left leg, badly shattering it. * * * I sank back to the sidewalk. I thought Mr. Boyle had fired the shots. During the time that I was sinking on the sidewalk, and immediately after, I fired three shots. When I first saw him (Boyle) when I sank he was over me on his hands and knees or all fours. After the third shot that I fired while sinking to the sidewalk, or immediately after reaching it, was fired, Mr. Boyle, whom I saw, as before stated, just above me, turned over, his left hand, so to speak, seemingly using it as a pivot, turned over to my left and to the east on the sidewalk on his back. As soon as the shooting ceased a crowd gathered, and among them I observed Constable Mosely, County Surveyor Barbee, my son, Herbert F. Hail, Dr. Walsh, and Dr. Bolton. * * * I said to my son, Herbert, 'I hope he wasn't badly hurt.' I also said to him, 'He,' meaning Mr. Boyle, 'had struck me on the head and broken my leg.'"

No witness, other than the defendant himself, was produced who knew or pretended to know just how the second encounter was started, or who started it. Unless, therefore, there are in the case physical facts which clearly run counter to his story of how and by whom the second and fatal difficulty was begun, the defendant's testimony upon the following points appears in the record undisputed: That, when the defendant retraced his steps from his office to the point where the original difficulty and the shooting transpired, he was on his way to the Masonic lodge; (2) that, although he thought it might be probable that he would again meet the deceased that night, he did not know, as he was on his way to the lodge, that Boyle was still at the scene of the first trouble; (3) that, as he approached the point where the first assault was made, and when within a few feet thereof, he saw Boyle in a crouching position behind a tree, with his right leg thrown back and his right hand upon his hip pocket; (4) that, upon seeing Boyle in that position, the defendant changed his course on the sidewalk, leaving the center thereof and moving to the walls of the building, or on the opposite side of the sidewalk from where Boyle was standing, and thus attempted to pass the deceased; (5) that, when the defendant was about two feet west of and from the deceased, and in the act of passing him, the latter suddenly sprang out and upon Hail and struck him a severe blow with his hand on the left side of the head, which blow caused the defendant to become dazed; (6) that, in the scuffle, Hail was wounded severely in the left leg above the ankle by a shot discharged from his own weapon. There is, however, an apparent conflict in the evidence, so far as circumstances are concerned, upon the question whether Boyle was shot by Hail before or after the latter fell back upon the sidewalk.

The theory of the prosecution at the trial was, as is their position here, that Hail, having gone to his office for the express purpose of arming himself, returned to the scene of the original altercation with the hope of again meeting Boyle and with the intention of avenging the assault made by the latter upon him; that the two men met; that Hail drew his revolver and shot Boyle before any act of violence by Boyle, and that the latter then attempted to wrest the weapon from Hail's possession; that, in the struggle that followed, Hail fired the shots that inflicted the mortal wounds in the body of Boyle and accidentally wounded himself in the leg.

There is, as already suggested, some testimony, very slight, however, which bears the appearance of supporting that theory. That two shots were discharged, and that, after an interval of approximately a second, three more were fired in rapid succession, appears to be well established. Some of the witnesses for the prosecution seem to have been quite positive that all of the five shots were discharged while the two men were yet upon their feet and engaged in a struggle. The witness Brown, for the people, testified that he heard two shots, turned around to see where they came from, and that he saw Boyle "make a grab for a gun." He said further that, prior to seeing Boyle "grab for the gun," the latter did not have hold of Hail. Dr. Stewart testified that, just before the shooting, he saw Hail walking faster than his usual gait from the direction of his office to the point where the shooting occurred; that within a short interval of time thereafter he heard two shots, looked in the direction of the place where the firing took place, and that he saw a struggle going on between two men. He said that, immediately prior to the shooting, he saw no altercation or struggle in progress between the parties.

It will be observed that neither Brown nor Stewart says or makes any pretense of knowing what was going on between the two men just before they heard the first two shots; that is, they did not know, and did not say, whether a struggle between the two men preceded the firing of those shots. It is, however, clear, from the testimony of said witnesses, and for that matter, from that of all the witnesses introduced by both sides that saw any part of the combat, that the deceased, if wounded by one of the first two shots, did not then receive a mortal wound. Dr. Walsh, the autoptical surgeon, testified that he found three distinct wounds in the body of the deceased, two of which were necessarily fatal, and from the effect of either of which death would almost instantaneously follow. The first of these wounds described by him, besides producing damage to other parts of the upper body, lacerated and destroyed the subclavian vessels—both the vein and the artery. The doctor explained that:

> "The subclavian artery and vein are feeders from the aorta, and just pass directly over under the collar bone, and go to form the blood supply to the upper extremity. They are large vessels, and a fatal hemorrhage would take place from either—from their injury—in a very few seconds." He said that a person thus wounded would likely die within 15 seconds after receiving the wound "and would probably be unconscious in half that time."

He said, in other words, that after the destruction of the subclavian blood vessels the person so injured would not be able to make a conscious movement; any movement of the body after that would be spasmodic. The second wound, in the order in which the doctor described them, while serious, was not necessarily fatal. The third "entered in the center of the breast bone, there passed a little downward and to the left, and came out right at the edge of the shoulder blade on the left side of the back, and then passed through the heart. In the last-mentioned wound there was no hemorrhage, the heart being bloodless, from which circumstance the doctor concluded and expressed the opinion that death was caused by the wound first above referred to.

From the doctor's testimony these facts necessarily follow: (1) That the death of Boyle was practically instantaneous with the infliction of the wound which destroyed the subclavian vessels; (2) that the shot which penetrated the heart was received after life was extinct, for it is an obvious proposition that, if the deceased had still been alive when he received the shot in the heart, there would have been evidence of more or less hemorrhage in that wound; (3) that the struggle between the two men, whether they were upon their feet or down on the sidewalk, must have immediately ceased when Boyle received the wound whose effect was to destroy the subclavian artery and vein.

The next inquiry which may well be made is: Were the defendant and the deceased down on the sidewalk when the mortal wound was inflicted? There were, it is conceded, but five shots discharged from Hail's weapon, and that of these one entered the leg of Hail, three the body of Boyle, and one "went wild," or in other words, struck neither Boyle nor Hail. That the bullet which entered Hail's leg was discharged from the pistol while it was yet in the pocket of his trousers seems to have been satisfactorily confirmed by the fact that said pocket was shown to have a hole in it, not unlike one which might have been produced by a bullet fired through the pocket, and evidently not caused by wear, since the pantaloons were comparatively new, and worn by Hail on only a few occasions before the tragedy. And, inasmuch as it appears that the effect of the wound suffered by the defendant was so to shatter the bones of his limb below the ankle as to render it impossible for him to stand upon it, he must have immediately, on receiving said wound, sunk back upon the sidewalk, and from this it would seem that he was struck by the second shot, and that two shots were discharged while the weapon was still in his pocket.

The theory following from the foregoing view of the testimony is that two shots were discharged in the pocket of Hail's pantaloons before he was able to draw the weapon therefrom, and that the three shots which entered the body of Boyle were discharged while the two men were in a struggle down on the sidewalk. Moreover, this theory is supported by the testimony of a number of the witnesses for the defense; they having asservated that, after the first two shots were fired, they saw Hail and Boyle fall to the sidewalk, the latter falling on top of the former, and that, after they had thus fallen, three shots were fired in quick succession, with the result that Boyle fell off of Hail and on his back on the sidewalk. Thus it appears that the physical facts themselves coincide with and support the story of the tragedy as told by the defendant. In other words, the physical facts are not inconsistent with or contradictory to the testimony of Hail, either as to how and by whom the second trouble was started or as to how the shooting occurred. On the contrary, as stated, they seem to bear out and support his testimony as to how and at what point of time the shots were fired, while, as seen, there is absolutely no testimony contradicting his statement that Boyle started the second trouble in the manner described by him. And he was not impeached.

Under the circumstances as disclosed, no one will dispute the right of Hail, after the first assault, to have armed and thus have prepared himself to defend his person against what he had reasonable grounds for believing might be another violent and perhaps a more serious assault upon his person at the hands of his implacable enemy, between whom and himself a mere fistic contest would have been unequal or one-sided and favorable to the deceased, because of the superiority of the latter in physical vigor and agility over the defendant, who was aged and still suffered, so he testified, from the effects of an injury to his head sustained by a fall some years before. No one will dispute the legal right of Hail to go out upon the public streets and his right to have returned by the route leading past the scene of the original difficulty to go to the Masonic lodge, of which he was a member, and to which he had been charged to carry a special message that evening, it being the regular meeting night of the lodge. It will be conceded that the story of the defendant of the second and fatal meeting, if true, disclosed a clear case of self-defense.

With the law and the only testimony showing, or tending to show, how and by whom the trouble between the parties at the second and fatal meeting was started thus stated, the question arises: Did the jury arbitrarily reject the defendant's testimony, or, examining it under the tests whereby the credit of human testimony must and can only be determined, did they question its verity, and so exclude it as a factor or element determinative of the question of guilt or innocence? It will be admitted that, with the exception of the fact of the homicide itself and the circumstance that the defendant resumed his way to the Masonic lodge over a course leading past the scene of the first assault, there is absolutely no affirmative testimony in the record tending to establish the crime of murder. And, if the jury rejected the testimony of the defendant, then manifestly, there was left in the record no testimony disclosing the circumstances of the beginning of the second difficulty, and therefore, obviously, none to show that the homicide was the result of a sudden quarrel or heat of passion—the elements of voluntary manslaughter—of which the defendant was convicted.

Thus we have examined, analyzed, and considered the testimony, not because we feel justified in declaring that the evidence does not, as a matter of law, support the verdict, but to demonstrate that, while the evidence may be said to be technically, and only technically, sufficient to uphold the jury's conclusion, there appears to exist a doubt of the gravest character of the guilt of the accused of any crime, and thus to illustrate the seriousness of the point, vigorously urged against the validity of the verdict, involving the charge that the district attorney, in his argument to the jury, unwarrantably used language whereby the defendant was deprived of a fair and impartial trial. Thus we are brought to the consideration of the point just mentioned.

[1] Preliminarily it is objected by the Attorney General that the point involving the asserted misconduct of the district attorney cannot be reviewed either on an appeal from the judgment or the appeal from the order denying a new trial, except where it is made to appear that by some ruling respecting the alleged misconduct the court has made an error which could be made the ground of a motion for a new trial. As sustaining this position, the Attorney General cites the cases of People v. Amer, 151 Cal. 303, 90 Pac. 698, and People v. Amer, 8 Cal. App. 137, 96 Pac. 401.

In the first-mentioned case it is said:

> "In view of the fact that the misconduct of the district attorney has so often been held to constitute a sufficient ground for reversal of the judgment, it may be that it has become a settled rule that the question of misconduct of the district attorney will be considered upon an appeal from the judgment, when presented by a proper record, and the points saved for review by exception."

In the second case referred to it is said that:

> "There is no authority whatever in the statute for holding that such misconduct of the district attorney, aside from any ruling of the court in reference thereto, can be properly reviewed on appeal from the judgment, unless it is a ground for a motion for a new trial."

It is further said in that case that, "if any other rule has been established, it must be by virtue of judicial legislation." In this case, however, the court refused to take any heed of the objection of the attorney for the defendant to the remarks of the district attorney constituting the alleged misconduct of that officer in his address to the jury, and in this we think the court committed an error which could properly be made the basis of a motion for a new trial. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the question of the misconduct of the district attorney, exception to such misconduct having been reserved and presented here by a proper record, may be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment. See People v. Pang Sui Lin, 15 Cal. App. 263, 114 Pac. 582.

[2] In the course of his argument to the jury, the district attorney said:

> "Men have been acquitted who have committed cold-blooded murder; and if you were to acquit this man under the testimony here, you would be allowing a cold-blooded murderer with human gore yet dripping upon his hands to go unwhipped of justice. Gentlemen, you cannot do it, you will not do it. Should you do it you would be afraid to go out on the street and meet your fellow men."

Counsel for the defendant, immediately upon the utterance of said language, assigned it as error, and moved the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. As before stated, the court, in effect, refused, or, at any rate, omitted to do so, saying: "I don't understand it; to me it doesn't mean anything; proceed."

That the effect of the statement that the jurors, in the event that they acquitted the defendant, would be afraid to go out upon the public streets and meet their fellow men was to intimidate or influence them to return a verdict of conviction, regardless of their views as to the effect of the evidence, cannot for a moment be doubted. Whether the language referred to was used in good faith or for the purpose of influencing a verdict is immaterial. The vice and damaging effect of the utterance upon the rights of the accused remained. In a case where evidence of guilt was overwhelming or conclusive, we might justly say that the language was not prejudicial in its effect upon the legal rights of the defendant, although the use of such language would in such case be none the less reprehensible. But this is, as we have shown, not such a case.

Both the defendant and the deceased were professional men; the one a journalist, actively engaged in following his profession; the other a lawyer, actively prosecuting the practice of his profession. They were, therefore, prominent and conspicuous characters in the county of Plumas and in its civic and social affairs. Both had resided in that county for many years, and, we have the right to assume, were respected citizens thereof. In the very nature of things, therefore, the tragedy must have aroused great excitement among the people of said county and have provoked a high state of public feeling. Doubtless, as is invariably so in such cases, where the actors are prominent and well known, the people of the community took sides, and were pronounced in their partisanship on the one side or the other. This condition of the public mind we cannot and do not take judicial notice of, but from common experience we know that it will arise and exist on occasions such as the one responsible for this case in a comparatively small community, in point of population, where everybody has more or less personal acquaintance with everybody else. Hence in such a case, where, as here, there is a manifest paucity of evidence tending to establish the guilt of the defendant, language such as the district attorney used in this case in his address to the jury must have had, and should be held to have had, the effect of denying to the accused that fair and impartial trial before a jury of his fellow men guaranteed by the law to every person put upon his trial for his life or his liberty. The language complained of amounts, substantially, to a direct declaration to the jury that, if they did not convict the defendant, they would lose the respect and confidence of their friends and neighbors. Thus the question of the honesty and the integrity of the jury was injected into the case. In other words, the jurors themselves were put upon trial by the district attorney, and whether they could bravely meet their fellow citizens and face them with clear consciences was made by that official to depend upon whether they found the defendant guilty.

[3, 4] A public prosecutor represents all the people, of whom every person accused of violating public law is none the less one because he is so accused. He represents the majesty of the law, which stands for the protection of every citizen against the taking of his life, his liberty, or his property without its due process—the law which condemns rather than commands the conviction of a person of a public offense upon insufficient evidence or by unfair means. That official should always do his sworn duty, of course, but he should always do it fairly and justly, and not permit the great power with which he is clothed to be converted into an instrument of persecution. He should, as indeed any lawyer should, in his address to a jury, remain strictly within the record, and not attempt to evolve any theory or to import into the case any features not fairly and reasonably justified by the proofs.

In this case the district attorney's address to the jury fairly reeked with violent abuse of the defendant and other declarations not warranted by the evidence or fairly within the bounds of the record or any theory reasonably deducible therefrom. He repeatedly characterized the defendant as a cold-blooded murderer, and often misstated the law of the case. He accused the defendant of having caused the hole to be made in his pantaloons pocket, where he carried his pistol, after the homicide occurred, when, as a matter of fact, there was not a scintilla of evidence to warrant the accusation. He made insinuations as to the contents and character of the article published in the defendant's newspaper, after the court had excluded it from the record. No exceptions were made by the defense to any of the declarations thus adverted to, but we here refer to them merely as indicating the general manifestly unfair attitude of the district attorney toward the accused and as disclosing a determination on his part to secure a conviction. Whether, as before suggested, that officer was actuated in his argument by a firm conviction of the guilt of the defendant or was thus carried away from the record by permitting his zeal to usurp the place of his better judgment, as is too often true with public prosecutors, we cannot say, nor is it necessary to inquire; since the palpable effect of his language upon the jury—the language to which exception was reserved—is the end of the inquiry here.

The cases are replete with severe arraignments of prosecuting officers for unfairness in the presentation of cases against persons accused of crime, and there have been very justly recorded many reversals for misconduct no more obnoxious than that complained of in the case at bar. The number of such cases is so large that it would greatly extend the length of this opinion—now more extended than had been desired—to attempt to notice all of them. We shall examine a few of them, however.

In the case of People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752, the language used in animadverting upon the conduct of the district attorney for referring in his argument to the jury to matters dehors the record has peculiar application to the present case. The court, after an examination of the evidence, said:

> "We do not feel like saying, under these circumstances, that, as a matter of law, the jury could not be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, but it is evident that the case was one of great difficulty, and required unusual circumspection and the utmost coolness and impartiality in its consideration. * * * In view of all these circumstances, certain occurrences at the trial have a significance which in a different kind of a case we should hesitate to attribute to them. Unfortunately the judge allowed himself rather frequently to question the witnesses, always in the interest of the prosecution, and often by putting questions which were leading and suggestive. We think the jury would be sure to get the impression that the judge thought the defendant guilty. Still more objectionable was the conduct of the prosecuting attorney. It is true, the court properly interfered, rebuking the attorney, and instructing the jury to pay no attention to the statements. But the statements were well calculated to influence the jury in a case of this character, and it is impossible for us to say that no injury resulted to the defendant therefrom."

In People v. Ah Len, 92 Cal. 282, 28 Pac. 286, 27 Am. St. Rep. 103, the Supreme Court, in reversing the judgment upon the ground that the prosecuting attorney in his address to the jury imported into the case matters which were not brought there by proof, said:

> "It follows that the only safe and just rule to apply in such cases is to make it impossible for a party to derive any advantage from such misconduct of counsel by promptly granting a new trial to the adverse party."

The court in that case also approvingly quotes the following language, most pertinent and forceful in its application to this case, from the case of Tucker v. Henniker, 41 N. H. 319:

> "When counsel are permitted to state facts in argument, and to comment upon them, the usage of courts regulating trials is departed from, the laws of evidence are violated, and the full benefit of trial by jury is denied. It may be said, in answer to these views, that the statements of counsel are not evidence that the court is bound to so instruct the jury, and that they are sworn to render their verdict only according to evidence. All this is true; yet the necessary effect is to bring the statements of counsel to bear upon the verdict with more or less force, according to circumstances; and if they, in the slightest degree, influence the finding, the law is violated, and the purity and impartiality of the trial tarnished and weakened. If not evidence, then manifestly the jury have nothing to do with them. * * * It is unreasonable to believe the jury will entirely disregard them. * * * They may think they have done so, and still be led involuntarily to shape their verdict under their influence."

In the case of the People v. Mull, 167 N. Y. 247, 60 N. E. 629, the New York Court of Appeals not only reversed the cause because of unwarranted statements by the district attorney in his address to the jury, but severely animadverted upon what seems to be a growing practice with prosecuting attorneys to travel beyond the records of criminal cases in their arguments to secure conviction. In that case, the district attorney, in his argument, among other equally reprehensible statements, said:

> "And if there is a man that sits in those chairs that is willing to brand himself with suspicion by saying that Archie Mull did not commit this crime, my judgment of his character is not * * * correct. * * * Don't let it be said of you that, from all the integrity and virtue and respectability of this great county, 12 men cannot be gotten together who will do justice. A failure to convict in this case, where there is no defense, and where there is no doubt, cannot fail to create again another epidemic of murder in this county. It cannot fail to bring within our borders hordes of desperadoes and criminals, who rely upon the puerile inefficiency and weakness of jurors here, and will select this as a safe field in which to operate. The consequences of your failure to convict in this case, in my judgment, cannot be weighed or gauged or measured at all. How could a more brutal, wanton, and pathetic tragedy be committed than this? * * * It seems to me to have been the purpose of the Almighty, in His stern and inscrutable justice, to have saved the life of this boy, to tell you who perpetrated this fiendish and unholy deed. But for the miraculous and almost divine rescue of this eyewitness from the very jaws of death, there might be a failure of justice; but a failure by you now to convict and punish the murderer would seem to me to be a mimicry and mockery against God."

The court, addressing itself to those statements by the district attorney, made inter alia, the following pointed observations:

"The trial by jury aims to secure popular justice. * * * The rules respecting the admission of evidence suffice to protect the defendant from prejudice by irrelevant and hearsay testimony, and declarations unsupported by evidence. It is the right of the people, no less than of the accused, to address the jury upon every matter legitimately bearing upon the case. The general rule is that each party must keep within the evidence. But the evidence may be examined, collated, sifted, and treated in his own way. Whatever of argument, suggestion, or inference can be constructed or deduced from it in support of guilt, upon the one hand, or of inconsistency, confusion, doubt, and uncertainty, in support of innocence, upon the other, is permissible, and may be presented with ingenuity, persuasion, vehemence, fervor, and effectiveness. * * * But it is nevertheless true that the verdict should be impartial, and be pronounced upon the evidence and according to the evidence. It follows that the address of counsel must be upon the evidence and according to the evidence. It is greatly to be feared that the remarks of the district attorney, in view of the former disagreement of the jury, and the positive, though unproven, assertions of the district attorney during the episode upon bribery, intimidated the jury. Why should a failure to convict excite widespread indignation? And upon whom should it fall? What juror was willing to be thought callous to public opinion, the respect of his fellow citizens, reckless of his oath, heedless of the welfare of his family, willing to brand himself with suspicion, unwilling to do justice, and willing to acquit such a murderer, whose guilt had been made clear by the testimony of an eyewitness, seemingly saved from death by a miraculous and almost divine rescue, according to the purpose of the Almighty, in order to prevent a failure of justice? Clearly we ought not to allow a verdict to stand, to the securing of which such methods and influences were thought by the public prosecutor to be necessary. If it be said that in the case before us there is no reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, it should be remembered that it is not for the courts, but for the jury, to say this by their free and impartial verdict; and we cannot know that they have said it, when we do know that they were told by the district attorney, and his statement was enforced by his previous declarations of attempts at bribery and his precautions against their success, that their own good repute was in jeopardy, and could only be saved by convicting the defendant."

Thus we have presented excerpts from a few of the cases upon the proposition under review, not for the reason that it is not clear in principle that reversals should be ordered where public prosecutors resort to the practice of bringing into their cases under the guise of argument or otherwise matters wholly outside the records and which are obviously calculated to influence juries, either consciously or unconsciously, in arriving at verdicts of guilty, contrary to the evidence and the law, but to show how such practice is uniformly condemned in strong language by the higher courts.

There are innumerable other cases in which similar views are expressed and like conclusions reached, and the practice referred to severely and justly condemned. It is not necessary here to review those cases, but among them the following will be found to be cogently applicable to the case at bar and instructive upon the question in hand: People v. Fielding, 158 N. Y. 542, 53 N. E. 497, 46 L. R. A. 641, 70 Am. St. Rep. 495; People v. Butler, 8 Cal. 435; Vickers v. United States, 1 Okl. Cr. 452, 98 Pac. 467, 473; State v. Kaufmann, 22 S. D. 433, 118 N. W. 337; State v. Underwood, 77 N. C. 502; State v. Bobbst, 131 Mo. 328, 32 S. W. 1149; People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 231, 30 Pac. 378; People v. Chew Bock Hue, 141 Pac. 950; People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 136 Pac. 291; People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 139 Pac. 78.

Our conclusion is that, with the defendant's guilt very doubtful under the evidence, the remarks of the district attorney above quoted were most damaging to the legal rights of the accused, that thereby he was deprived of a fair and impartial trial, and that the result reached by the jury, if permitted to stand under the circumstances, would involve a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

McKENZIE v. RAY. (Sac. 2097.)

1. PLEADING (§ 182*)—DENIALS—ADMISSION—SCOPE OF.

Where defendant set up a written receipt as a bar to the action, and plaintiff admitted its execution and validity by failure to file a verified denial, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 448, plaintiff may still contradict or explain the receipt by written or parol testimony at trial, but in case of failure he is bound by what the receipt purported to mean.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 387, 388; Dec. Dig. § 182.*]

2. PAYMENT (§ 74*)—PRESUMPTIONS.

The presumption that a debt evidenced by a negotiable instrument is unpaid, arising from the production of the instrument by the payee, is rebutted by receipts in full for all claims due to the payee which were admitted by the payee's failure to deny their genuineness or validity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 138, 139, 226–231; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

3. PAYMENT (§ 76*)—QUESTION FOR COURT OR JURY.

Where the validity of the receipts set up to defeat an action was not questioned, nor was it attempted to explain their terms, the question of the scope of the receipts is for the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 240–248; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

4. PAYMENT (§ 74*)—RECEIPTS—EFFECT.

A receipt in full of all demands, unexplained and uncontradicted, will defeat an action on a negotiable instrument given before the date of the receipt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 138, 139, 226–231; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 139*)—PROVINCE OF JURY—PEREMPTORY INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a verdict for plaintiff would be set aside for want of evidence to support it, the court should grant a nonsuit.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Colin McKenzie as executor of Nettie Montague Patton, deceased, against Ellen Ray, executrix of Don Ray, deceased. From a judgment for defendant and order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Gett, of Sacramento, for appellant. Denson, Cooley & Denson, of San Francisco, and C. A. Elliott, of Sacramento, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The suit was upon a written instrument, which was in the following terms:

"No. Galt, Cal. March 1st, 1894.

"Received from Alexander Montague Forty-four hundred and ninety-six 18-100 dollars. Payable on return of this certificate properly indorsed.

"$4496.18. Whitaker & Ray."

It was admitted by the defendant that the writing in question had been executed according to its purport, but the answer set up full payment of the obligation which had been evidenced by the said instrument, and in that behalf pleaded two certain receipts, which were as follows:

"Galt, Cal., July 23, 1903.

"Received from Whitaker & Ray, Thirty-three hundred and eighty-two 89-100 Dollars, being amount due Dr. Alex Montague at time of his death.

"Nettie Montague ex

"Executrix of the Will of Alex Montague, deceased.

"$3382.89-100."

"Galt, Cal., July 23, 1903.

"Received from Whitaker & Ray, Twenty-two hundred & six 63-100 Dollars, being settlement in full of A-C of A. Montague, deceased, and my account to date.

"Nettie Montague ex

"Executrix of the Will of Alex Montague, deceased.

"$2206.63."

Plaintiff did not by affidavit or otherwise deny the genuineness or due execution of these receipts. A jury was impaneled, and at the close of plaintiff's testimony in chief defendant's motion for nonsuit was granted.

The facts as established, partly by proof and partly by admissions of defendant, were as follows: The firm of Whitaker & Ray executed and delivered to Dr. Alexander Montague the document, dated March 1, 1894, upon which this suit is founded. This writing is called by appellant a "certificate of deposit" and by respondent a "receipt." To distinguish it from the receipts set out in the answer we shall call it "Exhibit A." Mr. Whitaker died in April, 1894, leaving Mr. Ray as the sole surviving partner. Dr. Montague died testate in 1902. His widow, Nettie Montague, was duly appointed executrix of his will. In 1903 she married Mr. Patton, and in 1904 the residue of Dr. Montague's estate was distributed to her. She died testate in the month of December, 1907, and in January, 1909, Mr. McKenzie became her executor. Mr. Ray died in April, 1910, and his wife was appointed executrix of his will in the following month. On July 26, 1910, a claim, based on Exhibit A was presented to the executrix of Don Ray's estate, and as it was rejected by her, this suit was commenced. At the trial, after introducing Exhibit A in evidence and examining a number of witnesses for the purpose of showing that Whitaker & Ray were acting as bankers in issuing that instrument to Dr. Montague, plaintiff rested, whereupon, the appropriate motion having been made, the nonsuit was granted.

Plaintiff makes the following contentions: (1) The nonsuit was improperly granted because the production of the instrument by the party claiming to be the creditor makes a prima facie case of nonpayment. (2) Exhibit A is a certificate of deposit, and therefore the statute of limitations does not run against it. Code Civ. Proc. § 348. (3) The demand is not barred under the doctrine of laches because the banking concern which has had the use of the money may not assert "injury through delay," which is the basis of all claims of laches.

Respondent defends the court's action in granting the nonsuit on the grounds that: (1) The action was barred by the statute of limitations; as there was no proof that Whitaker & Ray were bankers. (2) The demand sued on was stale. (3) The debt sued on was paid and discharged, and that fact stood as proven at the close of plaintiff's case.

[1-3] As we are satisfied that the last contention is correct it will not be necessary to discuss the others.

Appellant's position in brief is this: Usually the burden of proving nonpayment of a debt evidenced by a negotiable instrument would be on the party suing thereon, but in the case of a negotiable instrument produced from the possession of the party to whom it is payable there is a presumption of nonpayment which throws the burden of evidence on the party claiming payment. This burden is not met in the present case, says appellant, by the production of the receipts, even though they be in full of all demands. A receipt, he insists, is too general if it does not mention the particular writing whose possession raised the presumption of nonpayment. He relies principally upon Light v. Stevens, 159 Cal. 290, 113 Pac. 659, and Estes v. Ballard, 22 Cal. App. 345, 134 Pac. 361, but the case at bar is easily distinguishable from them. In the first-mentioned case it was held that the possession of the note sued upon was prima facie evidence of its nonpayment which was not met by mere proof that the person whose name was signed to it had paid to his creditor more than the amount of the note, without a showing that the money was paid on account of the particular obligation in suit. In Estes v. Ballard, the rule expressed in People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 179, 54 Pac. 833, is again announced, namely, that a presumption is evidence, and that it is evidence which may outweigh the positive testimony of witnesses against it. But as was also said in the Milner Case, "against a proved fact, or a fact admitted, a disputable presumption has no weight."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In the case at bar the two receipts which were set up by the answer were very broad in their terms and covered all amounts "due Dr. Alex Montague at time of his death," and "settlement in full of A-C of A. Montague, deceased." It is provided by section 448 of the Code of Civil Procedure that:

> "When the defense to an action is founded on a written instrument, and a copy thereof is contained in the answer, or is annexed thereto, the genuineness and due execution of such instrument are deemed admitted unless the plaintiff file with the clerk, within ten days after receiving a copy of the answer, an affidavit denying the same, and serve a copy thereof on the defendant."

Plaintiff failed to file the affidavit of denial required by this section, and he thereby admitted the execution and genuineness of the receipt. It was still open to him on the trial to contradict or explain the receipts by written or parol testimony. Having failed to do this, he is bound by what the receipts purport on their faces to mean (Carpenter v. Shinners, 108 Cal. 362, 41 Pac. 473; Brooks v. Johnson, 122 Cal. 569, 55 Pac. 423; Newsom v. Woollacott, 5 Cal. App. 723, 91 Pac. 347), and their substance is the acknowledgment of the payment of all moneys owing from Whitaker & Ray to Dr. Montague's estate. In this respect the case differs radically from Light v. Stevens, supra. In that case the proof of payment of certain sums of money was not held sufficient to overcome the presumption arising from the possession by the payee of the note in suit, but in this case the genuineness and due execution of two receipts is admitted, and these receipts purport to show a settlement of all debts between the parties at a date subsequent to the execution of the instrument on which the action is based. That plaintiff's admission overcomes the presumption arising from the possession of Exhibit A is plain under the very rule invoked by appellant by the citation of Estes v. Ballard, because against "a fact admitted a disputable presumption has no weight."

The receipts being unquestioned by plaintiff, it is for the court to construe them and to determine their meaning and effect. The documents admittedly genuine and executed in due form stand as exponents of the facts therein recited, "to be construed by the court, and the conclusions of law are to be deduced therefrom." Carpenter v. Shinners, supra. It is the duty of the court and not of the jury to determine the effect of the agreement between the parties. Luckhart v. Ogden, 30 Cal. 556; Ellis v. Crawford, 39 Cal. 527; Reed v. Swift, 45 Cal. 255; 9 Cyc. 784.

[4] The court properly decided the question regarding the effect of a receipt in full. While neither an ordinary receipt nor a receipt in full is conclusive against all attack, if uncontradicted and unexplained it stands as conclusive. 30 Cyc. 1224; note 30 on p. 1225. A receipt in full of all demands, if unexplained and uncontradicted, will defeat an action on a promissory note given before the date of the receipt. Cunningham v. Batchelder, 32 Me. 316. Such a receipt, in the absence of evidence of fraud, mistake, or nonpayment is a complete bar to the action. Virdin v. Stockbridge, 74 Md. 481, 22 Atl. 70; De Arnaud v. United States, 151 U. S. 483, 14 Sup. Ct. 374, 38 L. Ed. 244; Jones on Evidence (2d Ed.) pars. 491 and 492.

[5] The effect of the receipts under the admissions of the plaintiff and the correct construction placed upon the documents by the court being a complete bar to the action on the original writing (Exhibit A), the court very properly granted the motion for a nonsuit. With a jury present the judge ought to grant a nonsuit if a verdict in plaintiff's favor should be set aside for want of evidence to support it. Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 193, 81 Pac. 534; Downing v. Murray, 113 Cal. 463, 45 Pac. 869. We cannot see how a judge could have failed to set aside a verdict for plaintiff if the case had been submitted and the jury had returned such a verdict. Plaintiff's proof amounted to a showing of the possession of that which purported upon its face to be a written evidence of a debt owed by defendant's decedent, but this was coupled with an admission that the debt had been subsequently paid.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SAN DIEGO REALTY CO. v. HILL et al.

1. CONTINUANCE (§ 12*)—DEATH OF PARTY—POSTPONEMENT.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage given by defendant's grantor, where no deficiency judgment was sought, defendant is not, where plaintiff dismissed as to his grantor, entitled to a postponement because of his grantor's death pending the action, defendant having succeeded to all the rights and title of such grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 40, 42, 49, 50, 52; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 195*)—DEFENSE—NATURE OF.

The plea of limitations is an affirmative defense which must be established by the party asserting it, hence in an action to foreclose a mortgage given by a nonresident, defendant, his grantee, who set up limitations, is bound to contradict the recitals in the mortgage and other conveyance showing his grantor's nonresidence, which prevented the running of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 711–716; Dec. Dig. § 195.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 87*)—RUNNING OF STATUTE—NONRESIDENCE.

Despite the two-year limitation prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, on actions upon written instruments executed out of the state, limitations upon an action to foreclose a mortgage given by a nonresident do not begin to run under the direct provisions of section 351, until he comes within the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 456–462; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Action by the San Diego Realty Company against Luther M. Hill, John P. Klein and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mills & O'Farrell, of San Diego, for appellant. Sam Ferry Smith, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, foreclosing a mortgage, the defendant Klein appeals.

The complaint set forth the execution and contents of the mortgage, and of the notes the payment of which is secured thereby, and prays for judgment of foreclosure, in the ordinary form. It further alleges, on information and belief, that the defendant Luther M. Hill never resided in the state of California. The mortgage and notes were executed by Hill to O. J. Stough, who assigned them to plaintiff. John P. Klein subsequently became the owner of the land described in the mortgage. It is alleged in the complaint that neither of the subsequent holders of the title under Hill have ever resided within the state of California since the execution of the mortgage.

The answer of Klein denied the execution of the mortgage and notes sued on and the assignment thereof to plaintiff. It also denied the allegation that Hill had never resided in the state of California. As an affirmative defense it attempted to aver that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. It did not set forth this defense as provided in the Code, by averring that the action was barred by the particular section relied on, but merely alleged that the cause of action "did accrue or arise above four years before the said complaint was filed in this court."

[1] The point first urged for a reversal is that the court erred in denying a motion for a continuance made by the appellant, Klein, on the ground that the mortgagor, Luther M. Hill, was dead. The court overruled the motion, and thereupon plaintiff dismissed the suit as against Hill. Inasmuch as it appears that Hill had conveyed the property subsequent to the mortgage, that Klein now claims solely as successor of Hill, and that the decree provides for no deficiency judgment, but merely for a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged property, we can see no error in this ruling. Hill was not a necessary party to the action, and his death, whether before or after the beginning of the action, did not require any postponement of the trial after the plaintiff voluntarily dismissed as to him.

[2] It is further claimed that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the finding that the defendant Hill never resided in the state. This claim cannot be sustained. The mortgage sued on was introduced in evidence. It recited the fact that Hill resided in Chicago, Ill. There was also introduced in evidence the deed of conveyance executed by Hill to one Stringer on November 27, 1894, conveying to Stringer the property here in controversy. This deed recites that Hill was "of Chicago, Illinois," at that time. The record further shows that Klein derived his title by mesne conveyances from Stringer. This mortgage and this conveyance by Hill, who was Klein's predecessor in interest, and under which Klein holds such title as he has, are evidence, as against Klein, of the facts recited therein in connection with the conveyance, and are sufficient to support the finding. The plea of the statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which the defendant was required to establish by proof disproving the recitals. No attempt was made upon the trial to controvert the fact of Hill's residence in Chicago, nor was any evidence introduced to show that he ever resided in the state of California.

[3] The mortgage was executed on May 29, 1894, and the three notes secured thereby fell due, respectively, on May 29, 1895, May 29, 1896, and May 29, 1897. Section 339 provides that an action founded on a written instrument executed out of the state must be begun within two years from the time the cause of action accrued, but section 351 further provides that if when an action accrues against a person he is out of the state, the action may be begun within the term prescribed after his return to the state. As the parties defendant to this action never at any time resided within the state, it follows that the bar of the statute has not run. The pleadings admit that all of the defendants other than Hill have, at all times, resided out of the state. No finding was necessary as to these defendants. Nevertheless the court made a finding to that effect. It is not necessary to inquire whether any evidence to support this finding was introduced or not. The admission in the pleadings was sufficient without any finding upon the subject, and the insertion of a finding does not vitiate the judgment.

These are the only points made in support of the appeal. We think it is entirely without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

BLAIR v. BROWNSTONE OIL & REFINING CO. et al. (L. A. 3662.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1008*)—Appellate Court—Findings of Fact.

The making of findings of fact is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the trial court; the District Court of Appeal having no authority to make findings of its own.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3955–3960, 3962–3969; Dec. Dig. § 1008.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 348*)—Mode of Appeal—Review—Findings.

Where an appeal was taken in the form prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, and it did not appear that any notice of the entry of judgment had been served on plaintiff as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 939, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the court's findings of fact was reviewable, though the appeal was taken more than 60 days after the entry of judgment.

3. Corporations (§ 426*)—Contracts—Cancellation by Secretary and Manager—Ratification—Knowledge of Directors—Failure to Act as Board.

Where a corporation's secretary and field manager attempted to cancel a contract between plaintiff and the corporation, and after the settlement, and before plaintiff sought to repudiate it, the secretary and one of the directors notified all the members of the board but one, their failure to do anything with reference to the cancellation agreement did not amount to a ratification of the cancellation, which could only be accomplished by a formal act of the board of directors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1596, 1702–1704, 1707, 1708, 1710–1716; Dec. Dig. § 426.*]

4. Appeal and Error (§ 1169*)—Disposition of Cause—Affirmance—Ratification—Estoppel.

There being a well-defined distinction between ratification of an agreement canceling a contract between plaintiff and a corporation and facts constituting an estoppel of the parties to deny the validity of the cancellation agreement, where a finding of ratification was not supported by the proof, the judgment could not be affirmed because of facts tending to establish an estoppel in pais not found by the court.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Blair against the Brownstone Oil & Refining Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. This judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal and a rehearing granted in the Supreme Court. Reversed.

See, also, 21 Cal. App. 676, 132 Pac. 605.

William H. Fuller and Chas. E. Putnam, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Leonard B. Slosson, of Los Angeles, and George E. Farrand, of Ventura, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This case went twice to the District Court of Appeal. On the first appeal (17 Cal. App. 472, 120 Pac. 41) that court approved the finding of the superior court that Blair had been prevented from completing the contract to deepen one of the oil wells of the defendant corporation by reason of the latter's failure to furnish the necessary materials for the proper prosecution of the work as provided in said agreement. The judgment was reversed, however, because there was no finding to the effect that the corporation had authorized the cancellation of the contract, although there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that plaintiff had given such authorization. The language of the District Court of Appeal in deciding this point we quote below:

"The court further found that plaintiff and defendant, in September, 1909, compromised and settled between themselves all claims or demands of any nature existing between them, and did then and there each release the other from any and all claims and demands growing out of the work done by plaintiff under the said contract, and by mutual agreement canceled and destroyed said contract, together with another made between said parties upon the same date. Defendant was a corporation, and the contract made was in writing. It appears from the evidence that several months after plaintiff had ceased work upon the well he called upon the secretary of the defendant company, and, according to the testimony of the secretary, said that he did not want the contract in question, nor another contract made for the drilling of a new well, brought up against him upon a claim for damages. The secretary said: 'What do you want me to do?' to which plaintiff replied: 'I want the contract destroyed.' The secretary then said: 'The contract is not here, Mr. Blair; I have not got it, but I can get it.' 'Well,' said the plaintiff, 'you can destroy the signatures and send it to me.' Later the secretary sent one copy of the contract, which was executed in duplicate, to plaintiff with the name of the president of the company cut off. Section 1699 of the Civil Code provides: 'The destruction or cancellation of a written contract, or of the signatures of the parties liable thereon, with intent to extinguish the obligation thereof, extinguishes it as to all of the parties consenting to the act.' Under the provisions of this section, the evidence quoted would justify the finding complained of, were it not for the fact that the record is silent, in that it fails to show any authority, either express or implied, on the part of the secretary to thus release plaintiff from his obligations under the terms of the contract, if he had, in fact, without defendant's fault, failed to comply with the terms thereof. The act of the secretary was wholly without any authority on the part of the board of directors of the corporation. Nor is it made to appear from the record that the corporation had any notice of the secretary's act or proposed rescission of the contract, and no facts are shown from which a ratification thereof would follow. The effect of the attempted rescission and release was to make a new contract between the parties, and, conceding that plaintiff made the proposal, it does not appear that the corporation ever assented thereto."

Upon a second trial the superior court again found that plaintiff was prevented from doing the work by reason of the failure of defendant to furnish the proper tools for the deepening of the well, and likewise found that the sum of $1.634.65 became due from defendant to plaintiff as damages on the 22d day of February, 1909. There was a further finding that the parties to the action did, on or about the 1st of October, 1909, compromise and settle between themselves all claims or demands of any nature then existing, and by mutual consent did destroy and cancel the contract upon which the complaint in this action was based, and "that said agreement of compromise and settlement was made on behalf of said defendant by its secretary, and immediately thereafter and prior to the commencement of this action and prior to any demand or claim made on said defendant by plaintiff, said defendant ratified and confirmed said agreement of compromise and settlement." Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appealed to the District Court of Appeal from said judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. That court approved the finding that damages in the sum of $1,634.65 became due from defendant to plaintiff on February 22, 1909 (the amount prayed for having been somewhat greater), but held that the plaintiff had been induced to enter into the alleged contract of compromise under the mistaken belief that, as defendant's president had been without authorization to sign the original written agreement between plaintiff and the corporation, that contract was invalid; the representatives of the Brownstone Oil Company having concealed from plaintiff the fact that, while there had been no previous authorization of the president's act, there had been a ratification of the said contract by defendant's board of directors. The District Court of Appeal accordingly decided that there had been no consideration for the cancellation of the contract in suit, that the finding of a valid obliteration of that agreement was without support, and ordered the trial court to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for $1,634.65, with interest thereon from February 22, 1909. A motion for a hearing in this court was granted because we discovered no findings in the record sufficient to support the ordered judgment. There was absolutely no finding by the trial court either that the defendant, fraudulently or otherwise, concealed the alleged ratification of the original contract from Blair or that the latter was ignorant of such ratification.

[1] The District Court of Appeal had no authority to make findings of its own upon that subject. The making of findings of fact is within the exclusive province of the trial court. Kellogg v. King, 114 Cal. 389, 46 Pac. 166, 55 Am. St. Rep. 74.

We have, therefore, examined the finding of the superior court with reference to the contract of compromise.

[2] The appeal was taken more than 60 days after the entry of judgment, and respondent contends that therefore the sufficiency of the findings to support the said judgment may not be considered, citing section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appeal was taken, however, under the provisions of section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it does not appear that any notice of the entry of judgment had been served on the plaintiff. Consequently it is proper for us to examine the contention that the evidence does not sustain the findings. Fraser v. Sheldon, 164 Cal. 168, 128 Pac. 33.

[3] The settlement which the court found to have been made was effected by the plaintiff, Blair, with Herbert Mills, the secretary, and Earl Carr, the field manager of the Brownstone Oil and Refining Company. It was in evidence that the business of the corporation was transacted by the secretary and the manager. At that time the directors of the corporation were Earl Carr, P. S. Carr, J. S. McCloskey, O. J. Stowe, and J. A. Donlon. After the settlement was accomplished, and before plaintiff sought to repudiate it, Mills, according to his testimony, told directors Donlon and Stowe that such arrangement had been made with Blair, and Earl Carr testified that he had similarly notified P. S. Carr and J. A. Donlon. It will thus be seen that a majority of the board of directors knew of the arrangement between Blair and their secretary and their manager relative to the destruction of the written agreement. The mere failure of the directors to do anything with reference to the agreement between Blair and their officers by which it was sought to cancel the contract between the corporation and Blair did not amount to a ratification of that agreement of cancellation. A ratification of the cancellation of the original written contract could only be accomplished by a formal act of the board of directors. Section 2310, Civ. Code. The record fails to show any such formal act, and, therefore the judgment must be reversed for the same reason that the District Court of Appeal reversed it on the first appeal.

[4] It might perhaps be argued that there was a mutual estoppel of Blair and the defendant to deny the execution of the contract of cancellation. But there is no finding of such estoppel, and where, as here, there has been a finding of ratification not supported by the proof, this court may not affirm the judgment, if the facts tend to establish an estoppel in pais not found by the court. There is a well-defined distinction between ratification of an agreement and facts constituting an estoppel of the parties thereto to deny its validity. Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 222, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by the Doak Gas Engine Company against J. R. Fraser. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. T. C. Gregory and G. Clark, both of San Francisco, for appellant. M. R. Jones, of Martinez, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal here presented was taken from the judgment within 60 days after its entry. The evidence is set forth in a bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff's complaint was in two counts. The first count was upon a promissory note, executed by defendant to plaintiff, on September 2, 1910, payable one year after date, for $1,750. The second count was for goods sold and labor done by plaintiff, to and for the defendant, of the alleged value of $520.75. Upon the second count the court allowed the plaintiff only $109.20. No objection is here made to that part of the judgment.

The execution and nonpayment of the note were admitted in the answer. The main defense was upon a counterclaim. The note was given in consideration of the balance due upon a contract for the purchase and installation of a 75 horse power Doak marine gas engine, with propeller and shaft, sold by plaintiff to the defendant, to be installed by the plaintiff on the defendant's freight launch Skimmer. The counterclaim alleged that it was a part of the contract of sale that the engine, propeller, and shaft should be suitable for the purpose of propelling the launch, and that they were to be installed by the plaintiff in a workmanlike manner, so that they would propel said launch; that the same were installed in an unskillful manner so as to weigh down the launch, reduce her utility, and make her navigation more dangerous and her operation unsafe, except in unusually calm weather, and in such a manner that they were not capable of propelling the launch in her work so that she could make regular runs, whereby, it is alleged, the defendant was damaged in the sum of $1,500. The court found that the allegations of the counterclaim, in regard to the unskillful installation of the engine, propeller, and shaft and the alleged consequences thereof were untrue. It is not contended that the evidence was insufficient to support these findings. The principal claim of the defendant is that the court below did not allow him to give evidence to show the defective condition of the engine.

The evidence showed that, after some negotiations between the plaintiff and the defendant, in which the defendant consulted Mr. Dickie, a competent naval architect and engineer employed by him in the matter, the defendant purchased the engine, propeller, and shaft from the plaintiff and executed the contract mentioned in the counterclaim, paying $1,000 down, and agreeing to pay $1,750 at a later date. It was further shown that the defendant employed Mr. Dickie to see that the work of installing the engine was properly done, and that the engine had the power required by said contract; that the work was done to the satisfaction of Mr. Dickie; that the engine was then tested by running the launch therewith a mile, in the presence of the defendant and Mr. Dickie; that Mr. Dickie thereupon found the engine satisfactory and gave a writing to the defendant recommending that the engine be accepted. Some time during this trial or immediately after, the bearings of the engine became heated, and this was called to the defendant's attention. After the test he took possession of the launch and ran it for about two weeks, at the end of which time it was discovered that there was some trouble with the babbitt metal in the journal bearings and, upon the defendant's demand, the plaintiff replaced it with new babbitt metal. The test was made and the launch and engines delivered to the defendant on June 25, 1910. The rebabbitting was done on and prior to July 30th. From that time until September 2, 1910, the defendant continued to use the launch and engine, during which time some additional trouble occurred with the engine, and at that time he signed and delivered to the plaintiff a writing accepting the engine, subject to the conditions of the contract and executed the note sued on. The evidence as to these facts was not contradicted.

[1] Counsel say that "at the outset the lower court closed the door to all proof as to defective construction" in support of the allegations of the counterclaim. The record shows, however, that proof was made of the defects above related, and that no proof was offered of any other defects. Before he accepted the engine the defects above mentioned had been removed or adjusted to his satisfaction, and thereupon he accepted the engine and gave his note for the balance of the price. This is a complete answer to the objection that the court closed the door to further proof. No further evidence was offered.

Plaintiff offered no evidence to prove the allegations that the engine was installed in an unskillful manner, or that it was so installed as to weigh down the launch, or reduce her utility, or make her navigation more dangerous except in calm weather, or render the engine incapable of propelling the launch or disabling the launch from making regular trips. These constituted the breaches of contract alleged in the counterclaim.

[2] Where a person purchasing machinery takes it and tests it, finds in it certain defects, and upon his demand the seller then remedies the defects to the satisfaction of the buyer and the buyer then accepts the machinery and executes the note for the price, he cannot, in defense to a suit on the note, set up such defects as a breach of the contract of warranty in the contract of sale. Those defects will be deemed to have been waived. The warranty, if any there was, will then be applicable only to defects afterward appearing or to those which were not thus discovered and waived.

[3, 4] There was no error in admitting the writing of Dickie recommending the acceptance of the engine. Dickie was employed by the defendant to make the test and the writing was given at the time of the test, with defendant's full knowledge, and no objection was made by him. Furthermore, he did not then accept the engine, but waited until he had made a further trial and had had certain defects remedied. Even if the writing had been incompetent, it could not have been prejudicial, in the absence of any offer to prove additional defects.

No other objections are urged to the action of the court below.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 122*)—APPEAL FROM PART OF JUDGMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 940, providing that an appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same or some specific part thereof, and serving a similar notice, a party may appeal from a specific part of a judgment, and such appeal ordinarily brings up for review only the part appealed from, leaving all other parts of the judgment in full force, and confers upon the appellate court no jurisdiction to review any part of the judgment except the part to which the appeal is directed; and an order of reversal, though general in its terms, will be construed to apply only to the part brought up for review, but these rules do not apply where the part appealed from is so interwoven and connected with the remainder, or so dependent thereon, that the appeal from a part affects the other parts or involves a consideration of the whole.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1212*)—NEW TRIAL —SCOPE OF ISSUES.

Where, in an action to enforce liens for debts due from a building contractor, who had abandoned his contract, against the owner of the building, judgment was entered, determining that the G. Co., the F. Co., and P. were not entitled to liens, that a fund deposited in court should be distributed among the other claimants, and that the defendant should recover his costs from the unsuccessful claimants, whereupon the unsuccessful claimants appealed from "that portion of the judgment in behalf of defendant W. and against plaintiffs G. Co., F. Co., and P.," and upon the appeal a new trial was granted, upon such new trial the appealing claimants could not litigate their right to such fund, which by the former judgment had been distributed to the other claimants, since the claimants occupied positions adverse to each other, and the judgment, awarding the fund to certain claimants to the exclusion of others, was in their favor, and was not appealed from; but the new trial was not limited, as claimed, to the question of costs, and the claimants might litigate the owners' liability in excess of the fund distributed by the former judgment.

3. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 3*)—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—VALIDITY.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1200, providing that if a contractor fails to perform his contract, or abandons it before completion, the portion of the contract price applicable to the liens of persons other than the contractor shall be the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, deducting payments then due and actually paid, invades no constitutional rights of the owners, even though the amount found to be due, added to the cost of completing the building by the owner, exceeds the contract price, as the cost of completion is incurred after the abandonment of the contract upon which the relative rights of the owners and the lien claimants depend, and is a matter with which the claimants have nothing to do.

4. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 281*)—SUITS TO ENFORCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to enforce liens for debts due from a building contractor, who had abandoned the contract, where the contract price was $10,249, and expert witnesses testified for plaintiffs that the work done and materials furnished prior to the abandonment amounted to 67 or 68 per cent. of the total labor and materials required for the complete building, while a witness for the owner fixed the proportion at 60 per cent., a finding that the amount applicable to liens was $6,591.15 was supported by the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Actions by the G. Ganahl Lumber Company, the Frick-Fleming Hardware Company, and others, against M. Weinsveig, which were consolidated. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs named for insufficient relief, and from orders denying motions for new trial, the plaintiffs named and the defendant appeal. Affirmed.

G. C. De Garmo and Wm. T. Blakely, both of Los Angeles, for plaintiffs. J. L. Murphey, J. W. Ballard, A. M. Norton, John H. Foley, and Lloyd W. Moultrie, all of Los Angeles, for defendant.

SLOSS, J. G. Ganahl Lumber Company, Frick-Fleming Hardware Company, O. F. Pealer, and five others instituted actions to foreclose mechanics' liens upon a lot and building owned by the defendant Weinsveig. The building had been partially constructed under a contract between Weinsveig, as owner, and one Reeve, as contractor. Reeve abandoned his contract, and the building was completed by Weinsveig. The actions were consolidated. The judgment of the court was that three of the lien claimants, to wit, G. Ganahl Lumber Company, Frick-Fleming Hardware Company, and Pealer were not, and that the other five claimants were, entitled to liens, that the liens of said five be transferred from the real property to a fund of $1,847.05 theretofore deposited in court by the owner, and that said fund be distributed, in proportions fixed by the decree, among the successful claimants. The three who were denied liens were given judgments against the contractor, and the owner, Weinsveig, was given judgment against them for his costs. These three plaintiffs thereupon appealed "from that portion of the judgment * * * in behalf of defendant Weinsveig and against plaintiffs G. Ganahl Lumber Company, Frick-Fleming Hardware Company, and O. F. Pealer." The appeal was transferred to the District Court of Appeal for the Second Appellate District, and that court reversed the judgment, on the ground that a finding relative to the completion of the building was not sustained by the evidence. G. Ganahl Lumber Co. v. Weinsveig, 16 Cal. App. 687, 117 Pac. 954.

The cause came on for trial again upon amended pleadings. The owner, Weinsveig, set up, in addition to other matters, the former judgment and the notice of appeal therefrom, limited as above set forth. He alleged that, pending the appeal, the money deposited in court had been distributed among the five successful plaintiffs pursuant to the judgment, and that the judgment had been satisfied by said plaintiffs. The court, upon the second trial, found in favor of these allegations. From them it reached the conclusion that, inasmuch as no appeal had been taken by G. Ganahl Lumber Company, Frick-Fleming Hardware Company, or Pealer, from the judgment in favor of other lien claimants, the part of the judgment distributing the fund of $1,847.05 among such other claimants had become final, and the parties appealing from the original decree could litigate (in addition to their liability for costs) only their right to hold the owner for the difference between said $1,847.05 and the amount for which he might, on a second trial, be found to be liable. Since the case was one in which the contractor had abandoned his contract, the amount applicable to liens was a portion of the contract price, to be computed according to the method defined in section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure. At the second trial that amount was determined to be $2,836.89, or $989.84 more than the sum which, by the first judgment, had been ordered distributed among the five successful claimants. This excess, the court concluded, was all that the three plaintiffs who had appealed from the original judgment were entitled to look to. Finding that they had established their right to liens, it apportioned this amount of $989.84 among them in the ratio of their respective claims, and entered a decree of foreclosure in their favor for the sums thus found due to them on account of their liens. From this judgment the plaintiffs G. Ganahl Lumber Company and Frick-Fleming Hardware Company appeal. The defendant Weinsveig also appeals from the judgment. All of said parties appeal, further, from an order denying their respective motions for a new trial.

[1, 2] The only question raised on the appeal of the plaintiffs is whether the court below was right in limiting their claims against the owner to the difference between the total amount found applicable to liens and the amount awarded by the first judgment to other lien claimants. The appellants contend that, by the reversal on the first appeal, the first judgment was set aside in its entirety, and the cause set free for a new trial of all the issues. This position requires an examination of the scope and effect of the former notice of appeal. That notice, as has been stated, was not directed to the whole judgment, but only to "that portion" thereof "in behalf of defendant Weinsveig and against" the three plaintiffs there appealing. It is now well settled in this state that a party may appeal from a specific part of a judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 940; Early v. Mannix, 15 Cal. 149; Luck v. Luck, 83 Cal. 574, 23 Pac. 1035; Whalen v. Smith, 163 Cal. 360, 125 Pac. 904, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1319. Ordinarily such appeal will bring up for review only the part appealed from, leaving all other parts of the judgment in full force. Early v. Mannix, supra. Such partial appeal confers upon the appellate court no jurisdiction to review any part of the judgment except the part to which the appeal is directed (In re Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 734), and an order of reversal, although general in its terms, will be construed to apply only to the part which was brought up for review. Whalen v. Smith, supra. These rules do not apply "where the part appealed from is so interwoven and connected with the remainder, or so dependent thereon, that the appeal from a part * * * affects the other parts or involves a consideration of the whole, and is really an appeal from the whole." Whalen v. Smith, supra.

The present case falls, we think, within the general rule, and not within the exception. The three plaintiffs appealing directed their notice of appeal solely to so much of the judgment as was in favor of the owner and against them. They did not assail those parts of the judgment giving relief to other lien claimants. The various foreclosure actions having been consolidated, all of the claimants were seeking to enforce their claims out of a limited fund, the amount of which was determined by the terms of the contract, read in connection with the provisions of section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the consolidated suit all of the plaintiffs were actors (Kennedy v. Dusenbery, 116 Cal. 124, 47 Pac. 1008), and, unless the fund should turn out to be sufficient to meet all claims, each was occupying a position adverse to all of the others. The success of any one would deplete the fund to which every other claimant must look. A judgment which awarded that fund to certain claimants to the exclusion of others was, therefore, not only a judgment in favor of the successful claimants against the owner, but it was also a judgment in favor of such claimants (as well as in favor of the owner), against those who were denied participation in the fund. The first judgment determined, in effect: (1) That the five nonappealing plaintiffs were entitled to liens for their claims; (2) that those claims should be satisfied, as far as possible, out of the fund of $1,847.05 deposited in court; (3) that the three appealing plaintiffs should not share in this fund; (4) that this sum was the limit of the owner's liability to lienors; (5) that the appealing plaintiffs were not entitled to liens or to any relief against the owner; and (6) that the owner recover costs against the plaintiffs last named. Parts 1, 2, and 3 were in favor of the successful lien claimants and against the appealing plaintiffs. Parts 4, 5, and 6 were in favor of the owner and against said plaintiffs. The latter three, and they alone, were covered by the notice of appeal. The Court of Appeal was, accordingly, limited to a review of those parts of the judgment. Since the appellants, on the former appeal, made no attack on the adjudications that other claimants had liens and that the sum of $1,847.05 should be applied exclusively to the payment of those liens, the judgment, in these respects, was not presented to the appellate court for review, and was not affected by the reversal. On the other hand, the adjudications that the owner's liability did not exceed $1,847.05, and that plaintiffs were not, as against him, entitled to liens, were appealed from, and were vacated by the judgment on appeal. On the second trial, the court below rightly held that the plaintiffs had lost their right to resort to the fund which had, by the former judgment, been distributed to other claimants, but that they might litigate their right to liens, and enforce such liens against any amount found due from the owner in excess of the $1,847.05 ordered distributed by the former judgment.

These considerations dispose of the appeals by plaintiffs. They likewise meet the defendant owner's contention that the only matter left open for adjudication after the first appeal and the order of reversal thereon was the judgment in favor of the owner for costs. Some further points are raised by the defendant Weinsveig in support of his appeal.

[3] It is urged that the rule of section 1200 is an invasion of the constitutional rights of the owner, at least in a case where the application of the section results in the payment by the owner of a total sum in excess of the contract price. We have heretofore held that the section does not deprive lien claimants of any protection guaranteed them by the Constitution. Hoffman-Marks Co. v. Spires, 154 Cal. 111, 97 Pac. 152; Hoffmann-Marks Co. v. Deming, 154 Cal. 138, 97 Pac. 155. In the Deming Case the question of the owner's right to complain of the provision was suggested, but was not involved in such manner as to require, or indeed to justify, a decision. The point is now squarely presented. We are, however, satisfied that there is no merit in the owner's contention. It is true that, under the mechanic's lien law in force at the time of the transactions under consideration, the liens could not, in the case of a valid contract, extend beyond the balance of the contract price properly due from the owner to the contractor. Butler v. Ng Chung, 160 Cal. 438, 117 Pac. 512, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 940; Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 179, 22 Pac. 509, 6 L. R. A. 588; Stimson Mill Co. v. Braun, 136 Cal. 122, 68 Pac. 481, 57 L. R. A. 726, 80 Am. St. Rep. 116. But this is precisely the theory upon which section 1200 is framed: The contract having been abandoned, the entire contract price is not earned by the contractor, and the whole of it cannot be applied to the satisfaction of claims against the contractor. The performance of the contract has come to an end. The rights of those who claim under the contractor must be fixed with reference to the relation between him and the owner at the time of the abandonment. The proportion of the contract price then earned, less payments already made, represents the fund due to the contractor, and therefore applicable to the payment of claims against him. This proportion is, under section 1200, "estimated by the standard of the whole contract price." Thus the right of the owner to have his liability measured by the contract price is fully protected. If the contract had been completed, the entire price, less payments, would have been applicable to liens. If one-half or one-third of the total work has been done, one-half or one-third of the total price, less payments, is set apart for lienors. This is entirely just and fair, not only to the claimants (Hoffman-Marks Co. v. Spires, supra), but to the owner as well. The cost actually incurred thereafter by the owner in completing the building is a false quantity in this inquiry. It is not a part of the contract price earned by the contractor, and for that reason is not applicable to liens for goods or labor furnished to him. If that cost, added to the amount found due, under section 1200, turns out to exceed the original contract price, there will, to be sure, be a loss to the owner. On the other hand, he may be a gainer by completing the building for an amount which, added to the value of the abandoned work, will be less than the total contract price. His loss or gain, as the case may be, will be due to his failure or success in doing the work left undone by the contractor as cheaply as the latter had agreed to do it. With this item of cost the lien claimants have nothing to do. It is incurred after the contract, upon which the relative rights of the lien claimants and the owner depend, has been abandoned.

The sufficiency of the evidence to sustain various findings is questioned by the owner. Thus it is claimed that the finding that the building was completed on March 1, 1908, is contrary to the evidence. The actual date of completion, as the owner argues, was March 7th. The importance of this point lies in the fact that the two appealing plaintiffs filed their claims of lien on the 2d day of March, or before the completion of the building, if the appellant owner be correct in his view of the evidence. While there is much to support his contention in this regard, we think the record does contain enough testimony the other way to have justified the trial court in its finding that the building was substantially completed on March 1st, leaving undone at that date only "trivial imperfections." The testimony of the architect, while not very definite, was open to this construction, and the trial court so accepted it, as it had the right to do.

[4] The attack on the finding of the amount applicable to liens, upon abandonment by the contractor, cannot be upheld. The court found the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, estimated "as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price," to be $6,591.15. The whole contract price was $10,249. Two expert witnesses called by plaintiffs testified that in their opinion the work done and materials furnished up to the abandonment amounted to 67 or 68 per cent. of the total labor and materials required for the complete building. A witness for the owner fixed the proportion at 60 per cent. The value of the work and materials, as fixed by the court, was a trifle over 60 per cent. of the total contract price. This was fully authorized by the testimony to which we have referred. The amount paid by the owner to the contractor ($3,754.26) was not in dispute, and the difference between $6,591.15 and $3,754.26, or $2,836.89, was properly determined to be the amount which, under the terms of section 1200, was applicable to the payment of liens.

[5] From the sum payable to lien claimants the owner sought to deduct $300, claimed as damages for loss of rents occasioned through the failure of the contractor to finish the building within the time agreed. This item cannot be deducted from the fund available to lienors where the contractor has abandoned his contract. Marshall v. Vallejo Bank, 163 Cal. 469, 126 Pac. 146.

There are no other points of sufficient consequence to merit attention.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

YOUNG v. MATTHEW TURNER CO.

1. Specific Performance (§ 102*)—Contract to Sell Personal Property.

Where plaintiff sued on a contract by which he sold to T. an interest in a vessel, and T. bound himself and his heirs to give plaintiff the privilege to repurchase such interest whenever he should intend to sell, or after his death, alleging that T. thereafter assigned the interest to defendant corporation with notice, and that after T.'s death plaintiff demanded of defendant a conveyance of such interest, but his demand was refused, whereupon plaintiff prayed for judgment that defendant execute a proper conveyance of such interest, and, defendant pendente lite having sold the interest to another, plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint praying a money judgment, the suit was essentially one for specific performance within the rule that if there was no original obligation on defendant's part to convey, there was no liability for conversion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 318, 319; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

2. Pleading (§ 279*)—"Supplemental Complaint"—Purpose—New Cause of Action.

Plaintiff may not set up a new and distinct cause of action by a "supplemental complaint," the function of which is to plead facts material to the case occurring after the filing of the former complaint, leaving the former pleading intact, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 464.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 836–841; Dec. Dig. § 279.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Supplemental Complaint.]

3. Specific Performance (§ 116½*)—Executory Contract—Pleading.

A complaint for specific performance of an executory contract is not sufficient without an allegation of fact showing that the consideration provided for in the contract sought to be enforced is not inadequate, and that the contract is just and reasonable to defendant as provided by Civ. Code, § 3391.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 375; Dec. Dig. § 116½.*]

4. Specific Performance (§ 114*)—Pleading—Complaint.

A complaint for specific performance of an executory contract to sell personal property must allege facts showing that damages will not afford adequate relief, to overcome the presumption to the contrary created by Civ. Code, § 3387.

5. Specific Performance (§ 114*) — Contract — Presumptions — Consideration—Pleading.

Civ. Code, §§ 1614, 1615, providing that a writing is presumptive evidence of a contract, and that the burden of showing want of consideration is on the person seeking to avoid it, do not apply as a matter of pleading. in a suit for specific performance of a contract to sell personal property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–370, 372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

6. Replevin (§ 8*)—Nature of Interest—Option.

Where plaintiff had a mere option to repurchase a fractional interest in a vessel, he had no sufficient property right as would entitle him to maintain replevin.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. §§ 45–68; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

7. Specific Performance (§ 116½*)—Contract—Pleading.

Where plaintiff sued for specific performance of an option contract to sell a fractional interest in a vessel and by supplemental complaint recited that the interest had been sold pendente lite for a specified sum, and that no part thereof had been paid to plaintiff, but did not allege that he had been damaged in that or any other amount, the action could not be sustained as one to recover damages for breach of contract.

8. Trusts (§ 91*) — Constructive Trust — Personal Property.

Where plaintiff sold a fractional interest in a vessel to T. and T. executed an option contract to resell such interest to plaintiff, and later transferred it to defendant with notice, defendant did not hold the interest as a constructive trustee, so that, on defendant's sale of the interest to another, its liability to plaintiff at most was for damages for breach of contract.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment for $2,531.25. No testimony was offered by either party, the judgment resting upon the complaint, the answer, and cross-complaint. In the complaint, filed November 3, 1909, it is alleged that on August 1, 1894, Matthew Turner and plaintiff's agent entered into a certain contract whereby plaintiff sold to said Turner the nine-sixteenths interest in the brig Galilee for $13,500, and by which also Turner bound himself and his heirs to give the privilege of purchase to said Young whenever he should intend to sell the said interest or after his death, "the conditions of such sale or purchase being a reduction of $2,250 per annum" on the price of $13,500. It is averred that the said instrument was recorded in August, 1901; that on the 10th day of February, 1909, Matthew Turner sold and assigned said nine-sixteenths interest in the brig to the defendant corporation; that prior to and at the time of such sale and assignment defendant well knew of the execution, existence, and terms of the agreement between Young and Turner; that Matthew Turner died on February 10, 1909; that on May 14, 1909, plaintiff Young demanded of the corporation defendant a conveyance of the said nine-sixteenths interest, but that such demand was refused. The prayer was for a judgment that defendant execute a proper conveyance to plaintiff of said interest.

The answer admitted the execution of the contract between Young and Turner, but alleged that $13,500 was, at the time of making said agreement, the full value of the interest sold, "and that it was the intention and contemplation of the parties that the privilege of purchase should be exercised by the plaintiff, if at all, within a reasonable time, and that such reasonable time had long since expired before the death of Matthew Turner." The answer contained the following averment:

> "And defendant says that the plaintiff never has obligated himself to purchase the said vessel upon any terms, and has never made any offer so to do, and that it would now be unreasonable, unjust, and inequitable that the plaintiff be allowed to recover the nine-sixteenths interest in the said vessel without the payment of any sum therefor; that the defendant did not render, nor did the said Matthew Turner receive a good or sufficient consideration for the making of the said contract, or for the performance thereof as now demanded by the plaintiff."

There was also a statement in the answer that Matthew Turner did not sell his interest in the brig to defendant, but that it was transferred to defendant for convenience, the corporation having been formed by Turner and all of the stock having been issued to him. Finally the answer pleaded the laches of Young in delaying so long to assert his rights, if any, under the contract and set up the alleged bar of the statute of limitations. Sections 337 (subd. 1) and 343, Code Civ. Proc.

In April, 1911, plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint in which it was alleged on information and belief that on or about March 28, 1911, defendant sold the nine-sixteenths interest in the brig Galilee for $2,531.25, no part of which had been paid to plaintiff. The prayer was for that sum of money with interest, and, the case having been submitted on the pleadings, the court gave judgment for said sum of $2,531.25 and interest.

Respondent's position is that this is not a suit for specific performance; that the consideration of the contract between Turner and the respondent may not be impeached by mere pleading because the burden of showing want of consideration is on the party seeking to avoid the instrument (section 1615, Civ. Code); that by section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the presumption stands that there was a good and sufficient consideration for the written instrument; that this not being an action in replevin, the principle announced in Cardinell v. Bennett, 52 Cal. 476, does not apply; that appellant stood in exactly the same position towards Young that Turner had occupied; that the defendant held the nine-sixteenths interest for plaintiff as trustee of a constructive trust; that the application of the principle of such constructive trust is not confined to real property; and that defendant is liable to plaintiff for the proceeds of the sale without the intervention of equity (citing section 3309 of the Civil Code in support of the last position).

[1] We think this is in its essence an action for specific performance. As originally drafted, the complaint asked for that relief and nothing else, and the prayer for a money judgment was only made necessary by the sale of the chattel. If there was no original obligation on the part of defendant to convey, there was no liability for the conversion of the interest in the vessel.

[2] It is the function of a supplemental complaint to set up facts material to the case occurring after the filing of the former complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 464. It is not allowable to substitute a new and distinct cause of action by way of supplemental complaint. Brown v. Valley View Mining Co., 127 Cal. 632, 60 Pac. 424. Such a pleading leaves the former pleading intact. Giddings v. The 76 L. & W. Co., 109 Cal. 121, 41 Pac. 788; California F. & F. Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 743, 91 Pac. 593. The supplemental complaint in this case related to a matter occurring after the commencement of the action, which concerned the remedy rather than the cause of action. The essence of the pleaded cause of action was plaintiff's right to enforce the transfer of the nine-sixteenths interest in the brig from defendant to plaintiff.

[3] No action for specific performance of an executory contract is ever sufficiently pleaded unless the pleader observes the provisions of section 3391 of the Civil Code.

This rule has been followed in this state for many years in a long line of decisions cited in the opinion in the recent case of Joyce v. Tomasini, 142 Pac. 67. In that opinion this language was used:

> "It is well established as a rule of pleading in such cases that the plaintiff, in order to allege a good cause of action, must set forth facts which show that the consideration provided for in the contract sought to be enforced is adequate, and that the contract is just and reasonable to the defendant. A complaint which fails to state such facts does not state a cause of action to enforce such contract."

[4] All of the cases cited in Joyce v. Tomasini, except one, relate to contracts to sell real estate. That one (Wait v. Kern River M. M. & D. Co., 157 Cal. 25, 106 Pac. 98) has reference to an agreement for the sale of personalty, and appellant contends that the rule must be more strictly applied, if possible, in such a case, than in those where contracts for the sale of real property are involved, because the pleader, in addition to setting up the facts essential under section 3391, Civil Code, must overcome the presumption of section 3387 that the breach of the agreement to transfer personal property can be relieved by pecuniary compensation. He is correct in such contention, as this court has frequently held. In the very late case of Gilfallan v. Gilfallan, 141 Pac. 623, this court held that although, generally speaking, the presumption arising by reason of section 3387 of the Civil Code will preclude a litigant from seeking specific performance of a contract for the sale of personal property, the presumption is disputable, and where facts are alleged showing that pecuniary compensation will not afford adequate relief, suit for specific performance is the proper form of action.

[5] Respondent cites sections 1614 and 1615 of the Civil Code to the effect that a writing is presumptive evidence of a contract, and that the burden of showing want of consideration sufficient to support a contract lies upon the persons seeking to invalidate or avoid it. In an action of this sort that presumption does not operate against a defendant as a matter of pleading, whatever force it may have as a matter of evidence. Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 171, 66 Pac. 231; Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 354; Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 613, 22 Pac. 327. The rule requiring a proper pleading for specific performance was not relaxed merely because the contract was a written one.

[6] If we treat the action as one at law for the recovery of specific property, we must conclude that plaintiff is without standing to maintain such a suit, because he had no property, either general or special, in the thing sought. Cardinell v. Bennett, 52 Cal. 477; Yukon River Steamboat Co. v. Gratto, 136 Cal. 538, 69 Pac. 252; Hilmer v. Hills, 138 Cal. 134, 70 Pac. 1080.

[7] Nor can we regard it as an action for damages for breach of contract because no damages are pleaded. The supplemental complaint merely recites the fact that the interest in the brig had been sold for a specified sum, and that no part thereof had been paid to plaintiff. There is no statement that this amount is claimed as damages, or that plaintiff was damaged by the transaction, and, if so, whether the damages equaled or exceeded the selling price.

[8] Defendant did not hold the interest in the brig as a trustee of a constructive trust. Plaintiff's contract was merely one of option which, under its terms, he was not required to exercise at any time unless he chose to do so. When Matthew Turner transferred the property to the defendant, Young had not sought to exercise that option. As it was personal property the most that may be said is that the defendant assumed the risk of liability for damages if it should fail to make a future transfer of the interest formerly owned by Turner in the event that Young should demand such transfer. No trust in the specific personal property could arise unless there were circumstances requiring the fulfillment of the option by the assignment of said property to plaintiff rather than the payment to him of his damages for the breach of the agreement. Plaintiff's argument upon the theory of a constructive trust is completely answered by that which we have said relative to the showing necessary to make a case for specific performance.

The only remedy that plaintiff had, if any, was damages for the breach of contract. Such remedy was not sought by his pleadings, and therefore no judgment should have been given in his favor.

The judgment is reversed.

HOFFMAN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

1. Evidence (§ 244*) — Actions for Injuries—Declarations of Agent—Effect.

An agent of a railroad company, employed to flag trains approaching a tunnel from the south, though in charge of telephones to warn men working in the tunnel of the approach of such trains, is not authorized to bind the railroad company by declarations as to the time of trains coming from the north; and, in an action by one injured by a train coming from the north, evidence that the flagman had informed him that there was plenty of time for him to run a push car from the main track to a spur is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 916–936; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 1050*)—Review—Harmless Error.

In an action by one run down on a railroad track, the error in improperly admitting evidence of a declaration of the railroad company's employé as to the time of a train cannot be considered harmless, because there was sufficient evidence to have sustained a verdict for plaintiff on the last chance theory.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by August Hoffman against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. W. McKinley and R. C. Gortner, both of Los Angeles (W. R. Millar, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment for $10,000, damages for injuries sustained through the alleged negligence of the defendant. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff was in the employ of the Union Hardware & Metal Company at Los Angeles. Said company's business included the sale of explosives. In connection with that branch of its business, it maintained a magazine a short distance from the line of the defendant's railroad track, at a point near Tunnel Station, about 27 miles north of Los Angeles. A shipment of 25 boxes, each containing 50 pounds of dynamite, had, in course of transportation, been placed on the ground alongside the defendant's track. The Union Hardware & Metal Company directed the plaintiff to go to Tunnel Station and move the 25 boxes to the magazine.

The dynamite lay at a point on the track about 700 feet south of the station. Some 275 feet north of this point there was a switch connecting the main track with a spur leading to the magazine. Upon reaching Tunnel Station the plaintiff requested of one Glenn, an employé of defendant, permission to use a push car in moving the dynamite. Glenn assenting, Hoffman took the car, pushed it along the track to the place where the dynamite was, loaded the boxes on the car, and came back to the switch connecting with the spur. Finding the switch locked, he unloaded the dynamite, and was proceeding to lift the push car from the main to the spur track, intending to then reload it with the boxes, when a freight train of defendant, approaching from the north, struck the push car. The dynamite exploded, inflicting upon plaintiff the injuries which form the basis of this action.

[1] The appellant contends that the proximate cause of the collision was the negligent act of the plaintiff in placing the push car upon the main track. The dynamite could have been moved, it is argued, without the use of the car, or, granting the propriety of employing the car, all danger might and should have been obviated by putting the car on the spur or side track in the first instance and keeping it there. We shall not enter into a discussion of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the implied finding of the jury in plaintiff's favor on this point. But in this connection the ruling of the court permitting plaintiff to testify to a conversation with Glenn relative to the use of the push car upon the main track becomes important. Over the defendant's objection the plaintiff was allowed to testify that, while at the station, before commencing the work of moving, he had said to Glenn, "Will I have time to go down there on the main track and put the stuff on the hand car and get it off on the side track before the train comes?" and that Glenn had answered, "Yes." That this testimony had a serious and direct bearing upon the issue of plaintiff's negligence, as well as upon that of defendant's negligence, is very plain. It tended to show that plaintiff was led to place himself in a position of danger by the affirmative act of defendant's agent.

Was this testimony competent? The defendant objected to it on the ground that Glenn had not been shown to have authority from the defendant corporation to make any such statement, and that he could not, therefore, bind the corporation by what he said. The objection should have been sustained. Some thousand feet or more north of Tunnel Station the railroad track ran through a tunnel, in which men were at work. The testimony of Glenn, which was undisputed on this point, was that his duties were to "keep time for the tunnel gang and flag trains—watchman." He was "flagging trains for the men working in the tunnel." There was also a watchman at the other end of the tunnel. The plaintiff's own testimony was that he had seen Glenn "flagging trains; he worked around the station there; had papers there and different things. I didn't look to see what they were, but saw him in the station there. It is the only house there. He always attended the telephones when the trains were coming through." The telephones were used to warn the men in the tunnel. The testimony does not show that Glenn had or was required to have any knowledge concerning the movements of trains, beyond such knowledge as was necessary to enable him to give warning of approaching trains to workmen in the tunnel. His duties in this regard were limited to trains approaching the tunnel from the southerly end, after passing Tunnel Station. Trains coming from the north, such as the one which struck the push car in this case, would traverse the tunnel before reaching Glenn's station. Furthermore, Glenn, as he testified, had nothing to do with the movement of trains, except as he observed them coming from the south. He had no occasion to note, and was not advised, whether regular trains were on time, or whether there were extra trains running.

Under these circumstances, it seems clear that Glenn was not acting within the scope of his actual or his apparent authority in advising plaintiff that there would be time, before the arrival of any train, to put the dynamite on a push car on the main track and move it to the side track. The case is, if anything, a stronger one for the appellant than was Clark v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 164 Cal. 363, 128 Pac. 1032. There the plaintiff was injured in falling from the platform step of a fast-moving train. He was allowed to testify that the engineer had promised that he would slow up at a point where plaintiff desired to alight, and that he (plaintiff) had taken his position on the step in reliance upon this promise. The admission of the testimony was held to be error, in the absence of proof that the engineer was authorized by the defendant "to slow up trains for that purpose." So here, in the absence of proof that Glenn had authority to permit the occupancy of the main track by persons not connected with the operation of the road, or to give assurances that trains would not pass in either direction within a given time, the defendant could not be bound by his statements in this connection, and the plaintiff had no right to rely upon them as statements authorized by the defendant.

[2] The plaintiff relied upon the advice claimed to have been given by Glenn as evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. An instruction embodying this view was given to the jury. The case was also presented on the theory of the "last clear chance." But, even if it be said that a verdict might have been sustained on the latter ground, this would not cure the error in admitting the evidence of the conversation between Glenn and plaintiff, since the verdict was general, and it cannot be determined whether the jury based it upon the ground of Glenn's assurance of safety or on a subsequent act of negligence.

An instruction dealing with the doctrine of "last clear chance" is criticized by appellant. The instruction is not as clear, in all respects, as it might be. It is apparent, however, from other instructions and from the briefs, that the true limits of the doctrine, as defined in many of our decisions, are fully understood by counsel, and we think there is no likelihood of a repetition, on another trial, of the objectionable part of the instruction referred to. We shall not, therefore, set it forth here.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO. v. DALEY.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 5, 1914. Rehearing Denied Oct. 5, 1914.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 909*)—Review—Presumptions.

All presumptions being in favor of the regularity of a judgment, it must, on appeal from a nonsuit in an action by an insurer on premium notes, to which defendant's name was signed by insured, her attorney in fact, be presumed that, notwithstanding defendant was named as beneficiary, insured reserved the right to change beneficiaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3675; Dec. Dig. § 909.*]

2. Insurance (§ 586*)—Life Policies—Interest of Beneficiary.

Where a life policy reserves to insured the right to change the beneficiary upon written request, the designated beneficiary has a mere expectancy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1470; Dec. Dig. § 586.*]

3. Principal and Agent (§ 109*)—Power of Attorney—Scope—"Use and Benefit."

Defendant gave insured a power of attorney, to sign her name to negotiable instruments, and to act for her "use and benefit." Insured procured a policy on his own life, in which defendant was named as beneficiary, giving in payment for the first premium a note to which he signed defendant's name. Held that, as insured could change the beneficiary, the giving of the note was not for defendant's benefit, and no recovery could be had against her.

4. Principal and Agent (§ 109*)—Powers of Attorney—Construction.

A power of attorney, authorizing an agent to act for the use and benefit of defendant, to receive moneys due, and sign negotiable instruments, does not warrant the agent in signing defendant's name to a note given for the premium on a policy taken upon the agent's life.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by the New York Life Insurance Company against Sarah M. Daley. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Mouser, of San Diego, for appellant. Sam Ferry Smith, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of dismissal of an action upon granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

The action is one to recover payment upon a promissory note alleged to have been made and delivered to plaintiff by defendant. It appears that in 1894 plaintiff issued to T. J. Daley, husband of defendant, a policy of life insurance, wherein defendant was named as beneficiary, payment of the premium upon which was made by a promissory note in the sum of $437, signed by T. J. Daley and Sarah M. Daley, the defendant, by T. J. Daley, her attorney in fact. Shortly after the execution of this note the insurance policy was canceled. Upon default being made in the payment of the note, the same was renewed; the renewal note being likewise signed by defendant, through T. J. Daley as her attorney in fact. The subject of this suit is a note thus given in renewal as evidence of the indebtedness.

[1-3] No question of estoppel or ratification is involved, for the reason that it appears defendant had no knowledge or notice of the giving of the original note, or any of the several notes given in renewal thereof. Nor does it appear that she had any vested interest in the policy of insurance issued upon the life of T. J. Daley. It does appear, however, that during the period extending from the time of the making and delivery of the note sued upon T. J. Daley held a general power of attorney executed by defendant. This instrument reads:

> "I, Sarah M. Daley, * * * do make, constitute, and appoint T. J. Daley * * * my true and lawful attorney, for me and in my name, place, and stead, and for my use and benefit, to ask, demand, sue for, recover, collect, and receive all such sums of money, debts, dues, account, legacies, bequests, interests, dividends, annuities, and demands whatsoever as are now or shall hereafter become due, owing, payable, or belonging to me and have, use, and take all lawful ways and means in my name or otherwise for the recovery thereof by attachments, arrests, distress, or otherwise, and to compromise and agree for the same and acquittances or other sufficient discharges for the same, for me and in my name, to make, seal, and deliver, to bargain, contract, agree for, purchase, receive, and take lands, tenements, hereditaments, and accept the seisin and possession of all lands, and all deeds and other assurances in the law therefor, and to lease, let, demise, bargain, sell, remise, release, convey, mortgage, and hypothecate lands, tenements, and hereditaments, upon such terms and conditions and under such covenants as he shall think fit; also to bargain and agree for, buy, sell, mortgage, hypothecate, and in any and every way and manner deal in and with goods, wares, and merchandise, choses in action, and other property in possession or in action, and to make, do, and transact all and every kind of business of what nature and kind soever, and also for me and in my name, and as my act and deed, to sign, seal, execute, deliver, and acknowledge such deeds, leases, and assignments of leases, covenants, indentures, agreements, mortgages, hypothecations, bottomries, charter parties, bills of lading, bills, bonds, notes, receipts, evidence of debt, releases, and satisfaction of mortgage, judgments, and other debts, and such other instruments in writing of whatsoever kind and nature as may be necessary or proper in the premises."

Since, in the performance of all the acts specified, the power conferred is in express terms restricted to those acts only which were for defendant's "use and benefit," it is impossible in any event to perceive how she could be held liable in the absence of a showing of such fact. We cannot assume, by reason of defendant being named as beneficiary in the policy, that she had a vested interest therein. Indeed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary (and there is none), we must, under the rule that every presumption is in favor of the regularity of the judgment, assume that the insured reserved the right of revocation and change as to the beneficiary so named. "Where a policy of life insurance reserves to the insured the right to change the beneficiary, upon written request therefor, the interest of the designated beneficiary prior to the death of the insured is that of a mere expectancy of an incompleted gift, subject to revocation at the will of the insured." McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 23 Cal. App. 694, 139 Pac. 242, and cases therein cited. This being true, it cannot be said the giving of the note purporting to obligate defendant was for her use and benefit.

[4] Moreover, the rule is that formal instruments conferring authority to bind another must be construed strictly in accordance with the plain import of the language of the document, and its interpretation cannot be extended by implication, so as to authorize acts beyond those specified, unless absolutely necessary to carry out the powers expressly delegated. Harris v. Johnston, 54 Minn. 182, 55 N. W. 970, 40 Am. St. Rep. 312; Johnston v. Wright, 6 Cal. 373; Golinsky v. Allison, 114 Cal. 458, 46 Pac. 295; Penfold v. Warner, 96 Mich. 179, 55 N. W. 680, 35 Am. St. Rep. 591; Skirvin v. O'Brien, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 95 S. W. 696. Aside from the fact that the act of T. J. Daley in signing the note was not for the use and benefit of defendant, it clearly appears from an examination of the instrument that it did not purport to confer upon him, as such attorney in fact, power to execute in defendant's name the note to plaintiff in payment of the premium due upon a policy of insurance issued upon the life of Daley.

CASSIDY v. NORTON, Judge. (Civ. 1286.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 11, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 10, 1914.)

1. CERTIORARI (§ 5*)—REMEDY BY APPEAL—ERRONEOUS DECISION.

Where the defendant paid the fund in controversy into court and applied to have another substituted as defendant, accompanying the application with an affidavit setting forth every fact required for such substitution, under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, the court had jurisdiction to make the substitution, and its order cannot be reviewed by certiorari, even though the substituted defendant was not, in fact, the proper party to be substituted; the remedy being by appeal from the final judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. §§ 5, 6; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. PARTIES (§ 60*)—SUBSTITUTION—TIME.

Where a defendant, before answering, filed a proper application to have another substituted as defendant, which application was set for hearing after the time for defendant to answer would expire, the filing of the answer, which expressly reserved the motion to substitute, did not deprive the court of jurisdiction to make the substitution, under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, authorizing the defendant to apply for such substitution at any time before answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

3. PARTIES (§ 51*)—ADDITIONAL PARTIES—NECESSARY PARTIES.

Where a bank against whom an action on attachment had been commenced paid the money into court and had the sheriff, who had levied upon the fund, substituted as defendant, it was proper for the court, on motion of the sheriff, to require other attachment and execution plaintiffs who claimed the fund to be joined as defendants, under Code Civ. Proc. § 389, providing that when a proper determination of a controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must order them to be brought in.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

Certiorari by Elpha Cassidy against C. W. Norton, as judge of the superior court. Peremptory writ denied.

A. H. Carpenter and W. F. Lynch, both of Stockton, for petitioner. C. L. Neumiller and George A. Ditz, both of Stockton, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Petitioner seeks to have annulled two certain orders made by the superior court of San Joaquin county. The application is grounded, of course, upon the contention that the court thereby exceeded its jurisdiction. An alternative writ of certiorari was issued by this court, and in the return of respondent we have a full record of the proceedings of the lower court.

The first of these orders was made upon the 4th day of May, 1914, and was an order of substitution in the case of Elpha Cassidy v. Commercial & Savings Bank and provided and adjudged:

> "That upon payment by the above-named defendant, Commercial & Savings Bank, a corporation, into the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of San Joaquin, to the clerk of said court of the sum of $1,250 in gold coin of the United States of America, Wm. H. Riecks, sheriff of the county of San Joaquin, be and he hereby is substituted as defendant in this action for and in the place of said Commercial & Savings Bank, and that said Commercial & Savings Bank, a corporation, be and it hereby is dismissed and discharged as defendant in this action and from all liability in or as to the matter in this action, or to said Wm. H. Riecks, said sheriff, or to him for or on account of levies of writs of attachment or execution."

The second order was made on the 15th day of June following, and provided that John T. Lewis, A. L. Farrington, and F. B. Hubbard be joined as parties defendant, and that plaintiff file a supplemental complaint joining said parties as defendants and requiring the service of the same upon them.

[1] Both of these orders are clearly authorized by the statute. Section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "A defendant, against whom an action is pending, upon a contract, or for specific personal property, may, at any time before answer, upon affidavit that a person not a party to the action makes against him, and without any collusion with him, a demand upon such contract, or for such property, upon notice to such person and the adverse party, apply to the court for an order to substitute such person in his place, and discharge him from liability to either party, on his depositing in court the amount claimed on the contract, or delivering the property, or its value to such person as the court may direct; and the court may, in its discretion, make the order."

Every fact thus required to be presented was set forth in an affidavit of defendant accompanying a notice to the adverse party of an application to the court for such order of substitution. We can perceive nothing that was omitted therefrom. Indeed, it seems to have been eminently proper that the defendant should be relieved of any responsibility in the premises on the payment of the money into court, as, by reason of adverse claims, it could not safely determine to whom the payment should be made. The bank laid no claim to the money, and, the sheriff having levied upon it a writ of attachment and of execution, it naturally sought to have him substituted. But whether the sheriff was, as a matter of fact, the proper party to be substituted, the showing required by the statute was made, and we think there can be no doubt that the court had the legal right—in other words, the jurisdiction—to make said order of substitution.

[2] The only pretense of objection to the power of the court in the premises grows out of the fact that an answer was filed by the original defendant before said order of substitution was made. But before said answer was filed said defendant filed in the court a written notice of motion for the substitution and also said affidavit setting forth the grounds for said motion and offered to pay into court the sum of money claimed by the plaintiff. We consider said proceeding of the defendant as an "application" in the sense of the statute. The provision is that "at any time before answer" the defendants "may apply to the court" for an order of substitution. The defendant was not required to take the risk of being in default, not knowing, of course, whether the court would make the order of substitution. And since the application for such order was set for hearing at a day beyond the stipulated period for answering, the defendant very properly filed said pleading, expressly declaring that it did not waive "its motion for substitution of Wm. H. Riecks, sheriff of the county of San Joaquin, state of California, as defendant for and in its place and stead herein, or its notice of said motion served and filed heretofore on April 9, 1914, but insisting thereon." We think said defendant acted within the letter and spirit of the law, and no error was committed.

But, at any rate, the court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter of the action, and it had the legal right to decide the question of substitution, and if its decision was erroneous, the error could not be corrected on certiorari, but must be reached by an appeal from the final judgment in the case. Hibernia S. & L. Society v. Lewis, 117 Cal. 577, 47 Pac. 602, 49 Pac. 714.

We can discover even less reason for annulling the second order.

[3] The substituted defendant regularly moved the court for an order to substitute as sole defendants said Farrington, Hubbard and Lewis. In his affidavit in support of said motion he set out that at the instance of said Farrington and Hubbard, who were plaintiffs in an action against Frank E. McClellan and Minnie McClellan, affiant, as sheriff of the county of San Joaquin, had served a writ of attachment on all the moneys and credits of said defendants in said Commercial & Savings Bank, and also that he had served a writ of execution on said moneys and credits in an action wherein John T. Lewis had obtained judgment against said Frank E. McClellan and Minnie McClellan, and that thereafter the said Commercial & Savings Bank had paid into court the sum of $1,250, being all the money and credits that it claimed to have and belonging to the said Frank E. McClellan and Minnie McClellan.

In fine, it clearly appeared that the said Farrington, Hubbard and Lewis were claimants of said money, and were therefore necessary parties to the action, and that their participation was requisite to a final determination of the controversy as to whom the said money should be paid.

The condition was clearly one contemplated by section 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that:

> "When a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in, and to that end may order amended and supplemental pleading or a cross-complaint to be filed, and summons thereon to be issued and served."

The court seems to have acted entirely within the authorization of this statutory provision, and we can find neither irregularity nor excess of power in its proceeding.

We are satisfied that the question of jurisdiction, the only consideration herein involved, must be resolved against petitioner, and the order to show cause is discharged and the peremptory writ denied.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

3. Homicide (§ 203*)—Evidence—Dying Declarations—"Sense of Impending Death."

To constitute proof that an alleged dying declaration was made "under a sense of impending death," it is not necessary that the declarant should have expressed in words the belief that he was about to die, but it is enough if it satisfactorily appears in any mode that the statements were made under a belief by the declarant that he could not recover.

Where decedent was stabbed while in an altercation with defendant, the knife piercing the pulmonary artery, which wound was necessarily fatal in a few minutes, and decedent got up, staggered against a fence, and fell into the arms of a friend, to whom he stated that defendant had killed him, and death in fact ensued from one to two minutes after the infliction of the wound, the proof was sufficient to show that the declaration was made under a sense of impending death.

5. Homicide (§ 215*)—Evidence—Dying Declarations—Opinion—Conclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Mijo Vukojevich was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. McDonald, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant and two others were charged with the crime of murder. Upon a separate trial defendant was convicted of the crime of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] A sufficient answer to the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is that the grounds upon which the motion was based are not disclosed by the record; neither are the affidavits of newly discovered evidence, referred to in appellant's brief, incorporated therein. It devolves upon appellant to show the existence of error. In the absence of such affirmative showing this court, in accordance with the rule that all intendments are in favor of the regularity of the proceedings, will indulge the presumption that the ruling was correct.

All of the parties involved were Slavonians. It appears that on the afternoon of October 5, 1913, the attention of deceased, whose name was Charles Rezo, and several companions, all of whom were at the time in a house known at No. 114 Leroy street in Los Angeles, was attracted by the report of firearms at No. 118 on said street. Deceased left the house, followed by several others, going toward the house No. 118, at which time defendant, accompanied by several companions, all or most of them being armed with knives and pistols, met the party of deceased coming from No. 114, and a general fight, accompanied by much neighborhood excitement, ensued. In the affray Charles Rezo was almost instantly killed by a knife wound which pierced the pulmonary artery. According to the theory of the prosecution, this knife wound which caused the death of Rezo was inflicted by defendant, and it is apparent from the verdict rendered that the jury were satisfied as to the correctness of such theory.

[2] Counsel for defendant has filed a voluminous brief of nearly 100 pages, wherein he attacks the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. In his zeal in this behalf he not only quotes at great length the evidence pro and con given by the numerous witnesses, pointing out discrepancies therein which he insists render certain testimony given for the prosecution unworthy of credence and without weight, but, not content with so doing, produces what he claims to be the testimony of a witness given in another trial of one of the parties jointly charged with defendant, and by comparing it with the testimony of the same witness given in this case, attempts to show inconsistencies therein. If any question can be deemed settled law in this state it is that the appellate courts cannot and will not, where a substantial conflict of evidence exists, determine the credit which should be accorded witnesses, or attempt to weigh their testimony. It indeed appears useless to cite authorities in support of the proposition that under such circumstances no question of law is presented for review. In this case appellant, by pointing out the alleged discrepancies, concedes a substantial conflict in the evidence which, he says, renders it unsatisfactory. What is said in People v. Haydon, 18 Cal. App. 543, 123 Pac. 1102, 1114, is peculiarly appropriate in this case:

> "If, therefore, every case taken to the appellate courts were to be reversed because of discrepancies or contradictions in the testimony of witnesses without whose testimony a verdict of a jury or the findings of a court could not be sustained, there would indeed be few cases in which a reversal would not be compelled upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support such verdict or findings. * * * It is for this reason that our Constitution provides that the appellate courts are not authorized to review evidence, except where, on its face, it may justly be held that it is insufficient to support the ultimate issue involved. * * * In consonance with the spirit and intent of this constitutional provision, the Legislature has ordained that the jury are the exclusive judges of the credibility of witnesses (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847), and are the judges of the effect and value of evidence addressed to them, except in those instances where it is declared by the law that it shall be conclusive proof of the fact to which it relates."

While the record fails to show that any witness actually saw defendant inflict the fatal wound, it does show that defendant with another had deceased down, at which time defendant, with a gun in one hand and a knife in the other, was on top of Rezo, striking him with the gun; that he was pulled off of Rezo, when the latter got up, staggered against a fence, and fell in the arms of a friend, to whom he stated that defendant had killed him, his death following immediately after making the statement. In addition to the testimony of two witnesses to such fact, there was other evidence and circumstances which clearly pointed to defendant's guilt. Indeed, it is difficult to perceive how the jury could have reached a verdict other than one pronouncing defendant guilty.

[3] The chief question of law presented is the admission in evidence of the declaration made by deceased to the effect that defendant killed him. Witness Soldo, after testifying to occurrences immediately preceding the death of Rezo, stated that the latter died one or two minutes after he (the witness) asked him what was the matter with him. Thereupon he was asked: "What did Rezo say to you?" Defendant's objection that a proper foundation was not laid for eliciting the evidence, in that it was not made to appear that Rezo knew he was dying, was overruled and the witness stated that deceased, while lying in his arms, replied that "Mike Vukojevich (the defendant) and Grgo Vukojevich have killed me." Appellant insists that it was not made to appear that the declaration was made "under a sense of impending death," in the absence of which showing the statement was inadmissible. Subdivision 4, § 1870, Code Civ. Proc. To constitute proof of such fact it was not necessary that deceased should have expressed in words the belief that he was about to die. Says Mr. Greenleaf, in regard to the mode of establishing the necessary fact:

> "It is enough, if it satisfactorily appears, in any mode, that they (the statements) were made under that sanction; whether it be directly proved by the express language of the declarant, or be inferred from his evident danger, * * * or from his conduct, or other circumstances of the case, all of which are resorted to, in order to ascertain the state of the declarant's mind." 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 158.

[4] The evidence of a physician called as a witness was that such a wound as that inflicted upon deceased must necessarily result in immediate death. The testimony showed that death ensued from one to two minutes after the infliction of the wound. The evident danger of such a wound, followed by its immediate fatal effect upon the victim, was a strong circumstance tending to show that he knew his condition. People v. Ybarra, 17 Cal. 169.

[5] The statement made immediately preceding dissolution that defendant had killed him was not the expression of an opinion, nor a conclusion (State v. Saunders, 14 Or. 300, 12 Pac. 441; State v. Gile, 8 Wash. 12, 35 Pac. 417), but was equivalent to saying that defendant had inflicted the fatal knife wound which caused his death, and the use of the words "has killed me" justified the inference that deceased was cognizant of his dying condition. The evidence of Soldo in this respect was corroborated by the testimony of Mato Rezo. In our opinion, no error was committed by permitting the statement so made by deceased to be introduced in evidence as his dying declaration.

[6] Appellant complains of alleged misconduct of the trial judge, which he insists was prejudicial to his case. This contention is based upon the following proceedings: One Ephifanos, called as a witness on behalf of the defense, testified that when the trouble started a number of men were playing pool in a billiard room which he conducted. In describing the manner in which these persons left their game, he exclaimed:

> "My God, they flew out and ran and leave the cue, all six tables flew. I say, what is going on?"
> "The Court: I don't want you to use that language again in this court. Don't use any profane language in this court.
> "The Witness: Excuse me, I don't mean—they gone out—
> "The Court: Shut up, just a minute now. That seems to be the only thing that you can understand. Go ahead and tell your story but don't use any more profane language or you will get in jail."

It is impossible to conceive how the rights of defendant could have been prejudiced by the court telling the witness to shut up, or threatening him with a jail sentence for the use of the language in which he indulged. The degree of courtesy to be exercised by the court toward a witness is not a subject for judicial review, unless it clearly appears that defendant's rights were prejudiced thereby (People v. Casselman, 10 Cal. App. 234, 101 Pac. 693); hence the language used toward the witness is no concern of defendant.

[7] It is claimed the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by defendant. There is an absence of anything in the record showing that defendant requested the court to give any instructions; hence there is no merit in the contention. People v. Hettick, 126 Cal. 429, 58 Pac. 918.

Counsel for appellant has made excerpts from the instructions given, which, thus isolated, he claims were erroneous statements of law. Instructions must be considered as a whole, each part thereof in connection with the other, and as applied to the subject-matter thereof. Thus considered, the instructions given, covering upwards of 20 pages of the record, constitute a full, fair, and correct exposition of the law applicable to the facts established by the evidence. Our attention is directed to other alleged errors in rulings upon the admissibility of evidence offered. They are trivial in nature and, conceding such rulings to have been error, it is apparent that upon this record defendant could not have been prejudiced thereby.

We find no prejudicial error disclosed by the record, and the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

GIUFFRE v. LAURICELLA et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 10, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 9, 1914.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 670*) — CONCLUSIVENESS — MATTERS ADJUDICATED—IDENTITY OF PARTIES.

In an action against a married woman by the father and mother of her deceased husband, the complaint alleged that the husband conveyed real property to her upon the express agreement that she would hold it in trust for him during his life, and upon his death hold one-half for herself and deed the other half to his father and mother; but that she had refused to convey such one-half interest to the father and mother. The answer alleged that the conveyance was an absolute conveyance of all the right and title of the husband without limitation, condition, or trust, and that the land was community property. The judgment recited the court's findings that such property was deeded to the wife upon such express agreement, and that thereby a constructive trust was created, and adjudged and decreed that the property was so conveyed; that the trust should be enforced; and that the wife should convey one-half of the property to the father and mother and retain the other half in her own name and right. Held, that such judgment was conclusive, in a subsequent action for partition by the wife against the father and mother, that she was the owner of only a one-half interest, and estopped her to claim one-half of the property by virtue of her community right and one-half of the other one-half by descent from the husband; there being no merit in the contentions that the judgment made no direct reference to the ownership of the property, and that the wife in the former action was sued only as trustee, and that her individual title was therefore not in issue or litigated.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 266*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY — CONVEYANCES — ESTOPPEL TO DENY VALIDITY OF TRUST.

Under Civ. Code, § 1402, providing that upon the death of a husband one-half of the community property goes to the surviving wife, and the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband, where a husband, who was in poor health and intending to leave the country, and who desired to make some provision for his father and mother in case he did not return, instead of making a will giving them one-half of certain community property, conveyed the property to the wife on the express agreement that she would hold it in trust for him during his life and after his death convey a one-half interest to the father and mother, retaining the other half interest, she was estopped to assert that the deed was invalid, under section 172, providing that the husband cannot make a gift of community property or convey it without a valuable consideration, unless the wife, in writing, consent thereto, or to claim one-half of the property by virtue of her community right and one-half of the other half by descent from the husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action for partition by Marina Giuffre against Giuseppe Lauricella and another. From the decree, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. C. Sargent and J. F. Cavagnaro, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Jas. C. Sims and J. A. Spinetti, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action in partition. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of an undivided one-half interest in fee simple in a certain lot (specifically described in the complaint) situated on Tremont avenue, in the city of San Francisco, and that the defendants are each of them the owner of an undivided one-quarter interest in fee simple in said real property; that the plaintiff is the owner of an undivided three-quarters interest in fee simple in a certain lot (also specifically described in the complaint) situated on Oak street, in said city; and that the defendants are each of them the owner of an undivided one-eighth interest in fee simple in said last-mentioned lot. It is alleged that said two parcels of property cannot be divided in kind without great disadvantage and loss to the owners thereof, and that it is therefore to the best interests of all the parties to this action that both of said pieces of property be sold separately, and the proceeds divided among the parties to the action, etc.

The answer denies that the plaintiff is the owner of an undivided one-half interest in fee simple in the Tremont avenue property, denies that she is the owner of a three-quarters interest in the Oak street property, and alleges that the defendants are the owners of a three-quarters interest in fee simple in each of said pieces of property, and in support of these denials and allegations pleaded the judgment in a former action, in which Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella (respectively, father and mother of Domenico Lauricella) were plaintiffs and the plaintiff here, Marina Giuffre, was the defendant, and involving both the pieces of property described in the complaint.

The court found that the plaintiff was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in fee simple in each of the pieces of property mentioned in the complaint, and that the defendants are each of them the owner of an undivided one-quarter interest in each of said pieces of property, and entered an interlocutory decree accordingly, and furthermore therein ordered a sale of both pieces of said property and named a referee for that purpose. The plaintiff prosecutes these appeals from said decree and the order denying her a new trial.

The controversy here involves solely the Oak street property, and the objection to the findings and the decree is that, under the evidence and the record, the court should have found and adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of a three-quarters rather than a one-half interest in fee simple in said property.

[1] The facts of the case are not disputed, and may be stated in the language of the brief of counsel for the defendants as follows:

> "Domenico and Marina Lauricella were married in 1900. On June 16, 1904, the Tremont avenue property was conveyed to Domenico Lauricella (the husband) by a bargain and sale deed. On February 7, 1906, the Oak street property was conveyed to Domenico Lauricella and Marina Lauricella by a bargain and sale deed. On July 11, 1906, a deed describing both of these pieces of property was executed by Domenico Lauricella to his wife, the appellant. It was a bargain and sale deed, expressed consideration of $10, and contained no terms indicating an intention to create a trust. Domenico Lauricella died on September 10, 1906, and Marina (his widow and the plaintiff) married Domenico Giuffre on October 3, 1909. On March 26, 1907, an action was commenced in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, by Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella (respondents herein) against Marina Lauricella (appellant herein), numbered 7324, to obtain a judgment that the deed of July 11, 1906, from Domenico Lauricella to Marina Lauricella was made to her in trust, to hold the property for her husband while living, and after his death to hold one-half absolutely and to convey the other half, share and share alike, to Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella. Judgment went in favor of Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court upon appeal. 161 Cal. 61, 118 Pac. 430. Among the papers in that case is a satisfaction of the judgment, signed by plaintiffs' attorney, dated November 25, 1911. On November 15, 1911, pursuant to the judgment in Lauricella v. Lauricella, a deed was executed by Marina Lauricella to Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella, conveying to the grantees an undivided one-half of all the right, title, and interest received by her by operation of the deed of July 11, 1906."

The plaintiff introduced the following evidence, and thereupon rested her case: (1) Deed from one Westwood to Domenico Lauricella, dated June 16, 1904, conveying the Tremont street property to Domenico Lauricella. (2) Deed from McEwen Bros. to Domenico Lauricella and Marina Lauricella, dated February 7, 1906, conveying the Oak street property. (3) Deed from Domenico Lauricella to Marina Lauricella, dated July 11, 1906, conveying both said pieces of property. (4) Deed from Marina Lauricella to Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella, dated November 15, 1911.

The defendant then offered and the court received in evidence the judgment roll in the case of Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella v. Marina Lauricella, above referred to, after the plaintiff had objected to said evidence upon the following grounds:

> "(1) That said judgment was not binding upon plaintiff because the status of the title to the real property described in said action and in the action at bar came only collaterally into question; that any declaration in the findings and judgment in said judgment roll as to the character of the title was not necessary to a decision of the matters involved. (2) That defendant in said judgment roll was litigating in her capacity as trustee, and not as an individual. (3) That the parties to said action were not litigating for the same thing or under the same title; that the cause of action in Lauricella v. Lauricella and in the action at bar were not the same."

The former action involving the two parcels of property described in the complaint in the present action was one for the establishment and enforcement of a constructive trust; that is, for a decree declaring and adjudging the property here involved to be held in trust by Marina Lauricella (now Marina Giuffre) for the benefit of her husband, during his life, and, upon his death, one-half thereof to be conveyed in equal shares to the father and mother of the husband, and the other one-half to be retained by her, absolutely.

The complaint in said former action, after alleging the death of Domenico Lauricella, "alleges that Marina was his wife, and Giuseppe and Concetta his father and mother; that on the 15th day of August, 1906 (should be July 11, 1906), Domenico was the owner in fee of the Tremont avenue and Oak street properties; that it was all his separate property; that Domenico reposed great confidence in his wife, Marina, and, believing she would faithfully execute the trust, delivered to her, on August 15th, a deed of the Tremont avenue and Oak street properties, upon the express agreement that she would hold them in trust for Domenico during his life, and that upon his death she would hold one half for herself and deed the other half to Giuseppe and Concetta, in equal shares; that defendant accepted the deed to hold in trust, and without paying any consideration; that, since his (Domenico's) death, Giuseppe and Concetta had demanded a deed of one-half of the property, which had been refused; that Marina persisted in betraying the confidence of Domenico and in refusing to make such conveyance; that the deed, though absolute on its face, was intended to be in trust as aforesaid."

The answer to said complaint, besides containing certain denials, avers that Marina Lauricella was the owner of one-half of the Oak street property in virtue of her right of community.

The court's findings were in accord with the allegations of the complaint, except as to the Oak street property, and as to it the court found that that particular parcel of property was acquired during the married life of Domenico and Marina, and that it was therefore community property.

The position of the defendants is that the question of title to both pieces of the property described in the complaint was adjudicated in the case of Lauricella v. Lauricella, supra, and that therein it was adjudged that an undivided one-half interest in fee simple in each of said pieces of property was in the plaintiff in the present action and that an undivided one-fourth interest in each of said pieces of property was vested in each of the defendants in the former action, Giuseppe and Concetta Lauricella, and that consequently the judgment in said former action operates as an estoppel against any claim of the plaintiff of any further or greater interest in each of said parcels of property than that awarded to her by said judgment.

The plaintiff submits a variety of specific reasons for which, she contends, the judgment in the case of Lauricella v. Lauricella, supra, will not support the plea of res adjudicata in this action. The sum and substance of them all is that the same questions were not litigated in said action as are involved in the present action, and that the parties to the former action are not the same parties to this action. In other words, it is the contention that the plaintiff in the former action was sued in her capacity as trustee and not as an individual, and that her title to the Oak street property, as an individual, was not put in issue or litigated in said action. Another contention is that, while the findings in said action make some reference to the ownership of the property described in the complaint, the judgment is absolutely silent upon that proposition, and it is argued that inasmuch as an estoppel by judgment cannot be predicated upon a mere finding, but must rest wholly upon the judgment itself, there is no ground here for invoking, as a defense to the action, an estoppel by judgment.

From the foregoing and other propositions advanced for the purpose of showing that the title of the plaintiff to the property in dispute was not involved and litigated in the former action, it is contended that the plaintiff is entitled to assert here her full interests in the Oak street property, viz., an undivided one-half thereof by virtue of her right of community and one-half of the other undivided one-half, or altogether three fourths thereof; the latter fourth going to her by descent as of separate estate. Sections 1402 and 1386, subd. 2, Civ. Code; Lauricella v. Lauricella, supra.

An examination of the judgment roll in the case of Lauricella v. Lauricella will clearly disclose that the proposition which it rests on the plaintiff to establish in order to prevail in this action, viz., that the judgment in said action is not conclusive upon the question of the title to the property in dispute, and that said judgment cannot therefore operate as an estoppel against her right to claim any greater interest in said property than is therein and thereby adjudicated and awarded to her, cannot be sustained upon any conceivable view of the record before us. The judgment in said case reads, in part:

"* * * The court having filed its written findings of fact and conclusions of law, and having ordered that judgment be entered that the real property described in the deed of July 11, 1906, of Domenico Lauricella, deceased, to Marina Lauricella, the defendant herein, and set forth and described in paragraph 3 of plaintiffs' complaint on file herein, and set forth and described in said findings of fact filed herein, was deeded to said defendant by Domenico Lauricella, with the express promise, understanding, and agreement that said Marina Lauricella was to hold said real property in trust for her husband, Domenico Lauricella, while living, and after his death that she should hold one-half absolutely and should convey the other one-half, share and share alike, to the father and mother of said deceased, and that thereby a constructive trust was created, and having further ordered that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment, and that said trust be enforced in favor of the plaintiffs, and that, in accordance with the terms of said trust, defendant convey one-half of said real property to Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella, respectively the father and mother of said deceased, in equal shares, and that the defendant Marina Lauricella retain the other one-half of said real property absolutely in her own name and in her own right, * * * it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the real property described as follows," describing the Tremont avenue property. "Also all that certain lot, piece or parcel of land * * * described as follows," describing the Oak street property, "was deeded to said defendant Marina Lauricella, by Dominico Lauricella, deceased, with the express understanding, promise, and agreement that said Marina Lauricella was to hold said property in trust for her husband, Domenico Lauricella, while living, and after his death, that she should hold one-half of said property absolutely, and should convey the other one-half, share and share alike, to the father and mother of said deceased, and that thereby a constructive trust was created. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said trust be enforced in favor of the plaintiffs, Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella, and that, in accordance with the terms of said trust, defendant, Marina Lauricella, convey one-half of said property to Giuseppe Lauricella and Concetta Lauricella, respectively the surviving father and mother of said deceased, in equal shares. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant Marina Lauricella, retain the other one-half of said real property absolutely in her own name and in her own right."

That the object of said action, as disclosed by the averments of the complaint therein, was to have determined and adjudicated the respective interests of the parties thereto in the property described in said complaint is a proposition upon which there exists no possible ground for controversy.

It cannot be disputed that the complaint in the former action tendered an issue upon the question of the ownership of or title to the property, and that issue was joined upon that specific question is evidenced by the following allegation of the answer:

"* * * In that behalf, defendant alleges that said conveyance was an absolute conveyance of all the right, title, and interest of said Domenico Lauricella in all of said real property described in said complaint, without any limitation or condition or trust whatsoever."

As already shown, and, indeed, as is conceded, the findings followed the averments of the complaint, and it follows, therefore, that the court found that a trust in the property was created by Domenico, and that, agreeably to the terms of said trust, the title to one-half thereof was, upon his death, to be conveyed to his father and mother.

It is only necessary to compare the judgment with the issues made by the pleadings and with the findings to readily perceive that the former not only adjudicated every essential issue in the case, but that its scope is coextensive with the findings. In other words, it is clear that the effect of the judgment was to establish and adjudicate these facts: (1) That Domenico Lauricella was the owner of the property in dispute. (2) That he conveyed the same to his wife in trust for himself for life, with the remainder in fee to his father and mother and his widow, the former each to take one-fourth, and the widow to take one-half thereof, and that she accepted the trust. (3) That Marina repudiated said trust and claimed that, by the deed of conveyance from her husband to herself, the whole of the property and the title thereto was transferred to and vested in her, without any condition, limitation, or qualification whatsoever. (4) That, conformably to said adjudication, it was further ordered, decreed, and adjudged that Marina, in pursuance of the terms of said trust, as found by the court and established by the decree, convey to the father and mother of the deceased their respective interests in said property.

Thus it is to be observed that the respective interests of the parties to the present action in both parcels of property described in the complaint here were conclusively determined, established, and adjudicated in the former action.

[2] It is elementary, of course, that all matters in litigation which become the basis of a judgment are res adjudicata, and that to permit causes of action or defenses once presented, considered, and definitively determined to be again asserted in another or subsequent suit or action would be in violation of the principles underlying and supporting that salutary doctrine—a doctrine indispensably essential to any well-regulated system of jurisprudence—because the effect of its operation is to put an end to litigation, or to stop repeated trials of precisely the same question between the same parties.

In the present action, the plaintiff has attempted to reopen and renew the litigation of one of the several important questions which were conclusively determined against her and in favor of the defendants to the present suit in a former action. There is obviously no merit in the contention that because, so it is argued, the plaintiff here was sued in the other action in the capacity of a trustee and not as an individual, the parties to the former action are different from or not the same parties as those to the present action. In the former suit, the plaintiff was necessarily proceeded against both in her individual and in her representative capacity. As an individual, she claimed the entire property under the deed from her husband, and consequently denied that the parents of her deceased husband were entitled to a share thereof. It was for the purpose of establishing her capacity as a trustee with respect to the property and of enforcing the trust, and, to that end, to establish the groundlessness of her claim to all the property as an individual, that the former action was instituted. Whether the property was wholly and absolutely conveyed to her, or, as the complaint in the former action asserted, it was conveyed to her in trust for the purposes set forth in said complaint, rested wholly in parol, and the issues therein presented, considered, and finally adjudicated affected her as an individual as well as a trustee. Indeed, the sole issue submitted by her in resistance to the claims of the plaintiffs in that action involved the assertion by her of sole ownership in her of the entire property—an ownership which she claimed vested in her at the moment of the delivery of the deed to her by her husband and an ownership necessarily inconsistent with the trust theory upon which the plaintiffs in said action were required solely to rely to secure their shares of the property.

[3] But the whole question of the right of the plaintiff to the one-fourth interest in the community property (the Oak street real estate), which she is attempting to obtain through the medium of this action, was passed upon and determined against her by the Supreme Court on the appeal in the former action. Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 118 Pac. 430, supra. There it was argued that, as by the terms of section 172 of the Civil Code the husband has no right to make a gift of community property or convey such property, without a valuable consideration, in the absence of the wife's consent thereto in writing, a constructive trust in the community cannot arise or be created through or by means of a voluntary deed by the husband conveying such property to the wife. Replying to that proposition, the Supreme Court, through Mr. Justice Shaw, said:

> "In this case this puts the wife in the position of claiming a quarter interest in this parcel under the husband's deed, because said deed is void. The husband having died childless, leaving his father and mother surviving, if this deed is void the law would vest in the wife three-fourths of this parcel, one-half in virtue of her community right and one-fourth by descent as of separate estate, while the remaining fourth would go to the father and mother. Civ. Code, § 1402; section 1386, subd. 2. She can claim the last-mentioned fourth only under this deed and, in view of the conclusions hereinbefore stated, only upon the ground that the deed is ineffectual to convey anything. If she accepts the grant at all, she must take it with the burden and upon the trust by means of which she received it. Her claim of the entire estate under the deed constitutes an effectual estoppel to prevent her from asserting in the same breath that the deed is invalid as to one-fourth. White v. Stevenson, 144 Cal. 112, 77 Pac. 828. She is estopped by her conduct from claiming the other one-fourth interest as well. Although her husband had not power to make a gift of any part of the community property without her written consent, yet he had the power without her consent to make a will giving one-half of it to his father and mother. Civ. Code, § 1402. The facts are that Domenico was in poor health and was intending to depart for Italy in hope of recovery, and he desired to make some provision for his father and mother in case he did not return. He could at that time have made a will giving them one-half of this parcel. Instead of making the provision by that method, he chose to rely upon his wife and transferred it to her upon her promise to carry out his wishes by transferring it to them after his death. To this, with presumed knowledge of his power to do it by will, she agreed. It does not lie in her mouth to say now that if she had then refused to consent he would not have made the same provision by will. And having then, by her consent, prevented the making of the disposition by way of devise, she is clearly estopped, now when death has ended his powers, to say that the arrangement made with her consent shall not be carried out because it was not within his power then to carry it out in that mode without her consent in writing. Her allegation in her answer that it was acquired after the marriage, and therefore community property, authorizes the plaintiffs to rely on the estoppel in regard to that claim, without pleading it specially. Code Civ. Proc. § 462; White v. Stevenson, 144 Cal. 112, 77 Pac. 828; Fox v. Tay, 89 Cal. 344, 24 Pac. 855, 26 Pac. 897, 23 Am. St. Rep. 474; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 432, 51 Pac. 630."

The foregoing language conclusively shows and determines, not only that the question of the right of the plaintiff to the additional one-fourth interest in the Oak street property which she is seeking to secure by means of this action was lost to her when she accepted the trust and its burdens and consequences, but it further shows that said question was presented, litigated, and adjudicated in the former action, and that the judgment in the latter action operates as an estoppel to the maintenance of the present action. Indeed, while we have thought it proper to give this record a somewhat extended consideration, we are nevertheless at a loss either to perceive or to conceive any theory upon which, under the circumstances as disclosed to us, the plaintiff could ever have hoped to maintain this action.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of robbery, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The verdict was entered on March 27, 1914. The minutes of the court for March 31st, after showing the presentation of a motion for a new trial and the ruling thereon, state that an application for probation was entered for the defendant, "and the ruling thereon and the matter of pronouncing judgment herein are continued to April 3, 1914." On April 3d the defendant was in court with his counsel, the application of defendant was denied, and the court pronounced judgment against him.

[1] The only reason suggested for a reversal is that the judgment was not rendered or pronounced until seven days after the rendition of the verdict. This matter is controlled by sections 1191, 1202, and 1203 of the Penal Code. The general rule is that judgment must be pronounced not less than two nor more than five days after verdict; but it is further provided, among other things, that "the court may extend the time not more than twenty days in any case where the question of probation is considered, in accordance with section 1203 of this Code." It is true, as suggested by defendant's attorney, that the record does not affirmatively show that the court referred the matter of probation to the probation officer for a report or that any report was made. If this report was essential under the circumstances, it will be presumed that the court proceeded regularly in the matter, since the record shows nothing to the contrary.

[2] Furthermore, it does not appear that the defendant objected to the pronouncing of judgment on April 3d, or that he demanded a new trial upon the ground that the five days' limit had expired. "If judgment was not pronounced within the time limited, a new trial was made imperative if the defendant so desired; he became 'entitled' to it. * * * If the court should refuse a new trial and render judgment against the defendant after the authorized time has passed, its action would be erroneous and the judgment would be reversed on appeal, if an appeal should be taken." Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 189, 192, 106 Pac. 718, 719. The foregoing decision is authority for the proposition that the court had jurisdiction of this case on April 3, 1914, and that it might rightfully enter the judgment, in the absence of a motion or demand for a new trial, based upon the claim of delay in rendering judgment.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

25 Cal. App. 437

BREEZE v. INTERNATIONAL BANKING CORPORATION et al. (Civ. 1231.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 11, 1914.)

1. TRIAL (§ 398*)—FINDINGS—INCONSISTENCY BETWEEN FINDINGS OF PROBATIVE AND ULTIMATE FACTS.

Plaintiff and R. were law partners, and, in payment for services, were given by a client an order on a bank to which he was indebted to pay R. $7,500 and charge it to his account, holding as security therefor any collateral security held by the bank. R. pledged the order to the bank as security for his individual debt. Upon default in payment of the client's indebtedness, the bank sold the pledged securities to B., who paid the indebtedness and gave R. a note for the amount of the order, which note was held by the bank as security for R.'s debt. R., without notifying plaintiff of the giving of this note, represented that the client was insolvent, and induced plaintiff to sell his interest in the order for $500. The court found that the bank in such transactions dealt entirely with R., and did not consult plaintiff or give him any information respecting the transaction, though it knew of his interest; that the $500 was paid by the bank, but that it was advanced by R.'s father, and that the bank acted simply as R.'s agent; that the bank, when such payment was made, did not know that plaintiff had received no other consideration for the transfer of his interest; that plaintiff, after learning that B. paid the order, inquired of R. and the bank whether R. knew that he was going to pay the order before buying plaintiff's interest, and that both denied that he had such knowledge, but there was no finding that the bank deliberately made a false statement or that this statement was not in good faith. B.'s note was paid and the amount applied on R.'s indebtedness to the bank. Held, that there was nothing in these facts forcing the conclusion that the bank's part in the transaction was characterized by fraud, even conceding that B.'s offer to give his note for the amount of the order was communicated to the bank as well as R., and that the bank loaned R. the money paid for plaintiff's interest, and hence there was no inconsistency between the court's findings of the foregoing probative facts and its finding of the ultimate fact that the bank did not conspire with R. or any one else to induce plaintiff to sell his interest for a sum below its real value nor by representations procure him to assign his interest, or conceal any knowledge from him.

2. TRIAL (§ 398*)—FINDINGS—INCONSISTENCY BETWEEN FINDINGS OF PROBATIVE AND ULTIMATE FACTS.

On an appeal on the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions or other duly authenticated record of the evidence, unless it clearly appears that an ultimate fact found by the court is based upon or educed from the findings of probative facts, the probative facts found will not control, limit, or modify the finding of the ultimate fact, and the inconsistency between such findings will not justify a reversal of the judgment supported by the ultimate fact found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 673; Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 160*)—MISAPPROPRIATION OF MONEY—NOTICE.

Where a member of a firm of attorneys pledged an order for the payment of money, belonging to the firm, as security for his individual debt to a bank, and upon payment of a note substituted for the order applied the proceeds upon such debt, such facts alone did not put the bank on inquiry or charge it with notice that such partner was appropriating the firm property to his individual purposes, without the consent of his partner, and its failure to prosecute an inquiry or advise the partner of the transactions was not fraud on its part, as one dealing with a partner respecting firm property may assume that the partner is acting with full authority from his copartners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 190–300; Dec. Dig. § 160.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*) — PRESUMPTIONS IN SUPPORT OF JUDGMENT.

On an appeal on the judgment roll alone, where the court found a fact contrary to the allegation of the complaint, it could not avail plaintiff that the denial of such allegation in the answer was in the form of a negative pregnant, and amounted to an admission, since presumptively such question was treated as in issue at the trial, and presumptively there was sufficient evidence to support the finding on that issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3728, 3762–3771; Dec. Dig. § 931.*]

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 218*)—ACTION BY PARTNER—TRIAL—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

Whether a false statement by a bank, after plaintiff had been induced, by the fraud of his copartner, to part with his interest in an order for the payment of money, which his copartner had pledged to the bank for an individual debt, that the copartner, when he purchased such interest, did not know that a purchaser of certain collateral securing the payment of such order and other debts would pay the order, possessed much or little weight on the charge of fraud against the bank was a question for the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 49, 426–428; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

6. PARTNERSHIP (§ 144*)—MISAPPROPRIATION OF PROPERTY—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

Where a partner pledged an order for the payment of money belonging to the firm to secure his individual debt to the bank, and after the substitution of a note for such order allowed the amount paid on the note to be applied on such debt, the cancellation of the pre-existing debt from him to the bank constituted a valuable consideration, preventing the other partner from following the money so applied and recovering it from the bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Thomas H. Breeze against the International Banking Corporation and another. From a judgment in favor of the defendant named, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles H. Fairall and Thomas H. Breeze, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Richard Bayne, of San Francisco, for respondent. Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for defendant.

HART, J. The plaintiff instituted this action for the purpose of recovering from the defendants the sum of $3,250, together with interest from the 4th day of April, 1907. The trial court gave the plaintiff judgment in the sum of $3,741.26 against the defendant Robbins, but rendered judgment in favor of the bank. This appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff on the judgment roll alone from that part of the judgment which was rendered and entered in favor of the bank.

The gist of the complaint, in brief and in substance, is that the defendants jointly entered into a fraudulent scheme whereby Robbins was enabled to and did defraud the plaintiff out of his share of a certain sum of money which was paid to the bank and Robbins upon a certain order executed in favor of and delivered to the plaintiff and Robbins as copartners; the details of which transaction to be hereinafter more particularly set out. The allegations of the complaint are met by denials by the defendants; they having filed separate answers.

[1] The ultimate question submitted by this appeal is whether the judgment in favor of the defendant bank is supported by the findings. The specific contention of the plaintiff is that the ultimate facts found by the court are inconsistent with, and therefore not supported by, certain probative facts likewise found. The questions thus propounded will require an extended statement of the facts as found by the court. They are: The plaintiff and the defendant Robbins are lawyers by profession, and up to the 10th day of June, 1907, were copartners in the practice of the law. On the 5th day of September, 1905, one H. C. Stilwell retained said Robbins & Breeze as his attorneys in certain pending litigation to which he was a party, and on said day, for the purpose of compensating them for their professional services, he made, executed, and delivered to Robbins & Breeze a certain order for the payment of the sum of $7,500, which was in the following words and figures:

"Sept. 5th, 1905.

"W. H. High, Esq., M'g'r. International Bkg. Corporation, San Francisco—Dear Sir: Please pay Lloyd M. Robbins seven thousand and five hundred ($7,500) dollars and charge same to my account and hold any securities that you may have in which I am interested, as security for the same. H. C. Stilwell."

On the day of the execution and delivery of said order to Robbins & Breeze, Robbins indorsed the same as follows:

"Pay to International Banking Corporation. Credit to a/c of Robbins & Breeze.

"Lloyd M. Robbins."

The findings then proceed:

"IV. At the time Stilwell made and delivered this order he was the owner of a certain promissory note made to his order by the American Magnesite Company, a corporation, which note had theretofore been by him pledged to the defendant International Banking Corporation (hereinafter styled the bank) to secure the payment of certain moneys which he then owed that defendant.

"V. At that time and at the time of the deposit of this order by Robbins, as hereinafter found, Robbins was indebted to the bank in the sum of $2,900.

"VI. Robbins, after so indorsing this order, deposited it with and pledged it to the bank, and the bank accepted it as collateral to secure the payment of the debt so owed by Robbins. At the time of such deposit the bank knew and had full notice that the plaintiff was the owner of a half interest in this order. The pledge of this order by Robbins was made wholly without the consent or knowledge of the plaintiff, and he never consented thereto, but nothing further was ever done by the bank or by any one else under or by virtue of said pledge of the said order.

"VII. The note of the American Magnesite Company to Stilwell had been pledged to the bank under an agreement whereby the bank was authorized, upon maturity and nonpayment of the debt due from Stilwell to the bank, to sell the note at private sale, and at the time of its sale, hereafter found, Stilwell had pledged to the bank, and the bank held, certain other securities owned by him, as further security for his indebtedness to the bank, subject also to the terms of that agreement.

"VIII. On the 4th day of April, 1907, the indebtedness due the bank from Stilwell was matured and unpaid, and on that date one A. B. Bowers made an offer to purchase the American Magnesite Company's note and the other securities so held by the bank as pledges, and to pay therefor a sum equal to the amount of the Stilwell indebtedness to the bank, and also to give his note payable to the order of Robbins, payable one year after date, without interest, for the sum of $7,500, in lieu of and in substitution for the said order theretofore made and delivered by Stilwell, as hereinbefore found. Such offer was then and there accepted by the bank and by Robbins, but was not at any time by either of them communicated to plaintiff, and he was wholly without knowledge thereof until the 19th day of October, 1909.

IX. Bowers thereupon, on the 4th day of April, 1907, gave his promissory note to the bank for the sum of $12,795.90, the amount of Stilwell's indebtedness to the bank, which note was by him paid on the 25th day of April, 1907, and gave his note payable to the order of Robbins, payable one year after date, without interest, for the sum of $7,500, and the bank thereupon sold to Bowers the American Magnesite Company's note and the other securities so by it held as pledgee.

"X. On the 6th day of April, 1907, Robbins represented to and told plaintiff that the bank had sold the American Magnesite Company's note and the other securities to Bowers for the amount of the indebtedness due from Stilwell to the bank, but Robbins did not at that time or at any other time tell or inform plaintiff that Bowers had given Robbins the promissory note, hereinbefore found to have been so given. Robbins at that time further represented to plaintiff that, by reason of such sale, Stilwell was practically insolvent and without present means or ability to pay his order, hereinbefore found to have been by him made and delivered. By means of such statements and representations Robbins induced plaintiff to, and plaintiff did, offer to sell all his right, title, and interest in and to said order to Robbins for the sum of $500.

"XI. On the 10th day of April, 1907, Robbins stated to plaintiff that he would accept such offer, and stated that he had no reason to believe that the order would be paid, but that he was willing to take a chance that it would be paid. Upon such representation, and relying wholly and implicitly thereon, and in total ignorance of the note which Bowers had given to Robbins, plaintiff agreed to assign his interest in the said order to Robbins, and upon the 11th day of April, 1907, Robbins paid plaintiff the sum of $500, and plaintiff assigned, set over, and transferred all his interest in the order to Robbins. Plaintiff, prior to said time, had made no sale, assignment, or transfer of his interest in said order to Robbins or to any one whomsoever.

"XII. Robbins' indebtedness to the bank on the 4th day of April, 1907, amounted to over $10,000, and continued in excess of such sum until the 25th day of April, 1907, when said note so given by Bowers to Robbins was paid, as hereinafter found.

"XIII. On the 25th day of April, 1907, Bowers offered to Robbins to pay the sum of $6,500 forthwith in full satisfaction of said note, which offer was thereupon accepted by Robbins, and thereupon Bowers paid the sum of $6,500 to the bank as pledgee of said note and on account of Robbins, in full satisfaction thereof, and the sum so paid was by the bank forthwith applied to the partial satisfaction and payment of Robbins' then existing indebtedness to the bank.

"XIV. On the 6th day of May, 1907, plaintiff for the first time discovered that the said order so made and delivered by Stilwell had been paid by Bowers, and plaintiff at once made inquiry both of Robbins and the bank whether or not Robbins knew that Bowers was going to pay the order, before plaintiff had so assigned, transferred, and delivered his interest in the order to Robbins, and both Robbins and the bank denied that Robbins knew that Bowers was going to pay the order, at the time when plaintiff made such assignment. Plaintiff made diligent search to discover whether Bowers had promised to pay the Stilwell order prior to the 10th day of April, 1907, and the said assignment by plaintiff to Robbins, but was unable to make discovery, and had no knowledge or notice of that fact or of the note so given by Bowers to Robbins until the 19th day of October, 1909. * * *

"XVI. The bank neither lent nor advanced the sum of $500 to Robbins, which Robbins paid to plaintiff as hereinbefore found, but the said sum of $500 was advanced by the father of Robbins, and the bank acted simply as the agent of Robbins in paying to Breeze the said sum of $500.

"XVII. Robbins did not inform the bank, prior to the 4th day of April, 1907, or at any time prior to the 11th day of April, 1907, that plaintiff had assigned his interest in said order to him (Robbins), or that he (Robbins) had purchased plaintiff's interest in said order. The bank believed and knew that plaintiff had an interest in said order until the 11th day of April, 1907, when plaintiff assigned and sold his interest.

"XVIII. The bank never at any time informed plaintiff of the giving of the note by Bowers to Robbins. The payment of the sum of $500 to plaintiff was made to plaintiff by Wm. H. High, the manager of the bank, for the account of Robbins, and the fact of the giving of the note by Bowers to Robbins, of the assignment by plaintiff of his interest in said order to Robbins, and of the payment of said note by Bowers were each and all fully known and understood by the bank at the time of the happening of each, and at no time did the bank make any inquiry or take any steps to learn whether or not plaintiff was aware of the existence of the note from Bowers to Robbins at the time when plaintiff made such assignment, and the bank had no knowledge, at any time prior to the 12th day of April, 1907, that, nor did it make any inquiry whether, Breeze had received a consideration in addition to the said sum of $500 paid by Robbins to Breeze, as hereinbefore found, nor did the bank have any knowledge, at any time prior to the 12th day of April, 1907, that, nor did it make any inquiry whether, Breeze did not know on or before the 11th day of April, 1907, that Bowers had given to Robbins his note, hereinbefore found to have been given.

"XIX. The bank never conspired or confederated together with Robbins or any one whomsoever to induce plaintiff to sell his interest in said order for a sum very much below its real value or for any sum, never by any representations nor in any manner procured or induced plaintiff to assign his interest therein, and, while it gave plaintiff no information of any of the facts hereinbefore found, it never by any act or statement concealed any knowledge from plaintiff."

[2] We are unable to discover any inconsistency between the alleged probative facts and the ultimate facts found by the court, and, even if there existed between them the inconsistency claimed by the plaintiff, we would still be at a loss to understand how that fact could support his appeal, since it is manifest that the ultimate facts were not based upon or deduced from the probative facts.

Where the trial court makes both probative and ultimate findings, and the one set is inconsistent with the other, the general rule is as it is declared in the case of Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 299, 38 Pac. 740, as follows:

> "Findings of probative facts will not, in general, control, limit, or modify the finding of the ultimate fact. The province of the trial court is to find the ultimate facts, and not probative facts. If, from a consideration of the probative facts, this court should determine that they did not justify the finding of the ultimate fact it would determine that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision. This, it has been repeatedly held, cannot be done in this mode."

In Pio Pico v. Cuyas, 47 Cal. 174, 178, it is said:

> "It has been repeatedly held that a finding of the court cannot be impeached upon the ground that it is contrary to the evidence, otherwise than by a motion for a new trial and statement of evidence upon the motion. We can consider, upon appeal from the judgment, only the ultimate facts found by the court, and not the probative facts which have no proper place in the findings."

See, also, Smith v. Acker, 52 Cal. 217; Frazier v. Crowell, 52 Cal. 399; Gill v. Driver, 90 Cal. 72, 27 Pac. 64; Rankin v. Newman, 107 Cal. 602, 40 Pac. 1024, 41 Pac. 304; Commercial Bank v. Redfield, 122 Cal. 405, 55 Pac. 160, 772; Brown v. Mut. Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 137 Cal. 278, 70 Pac. 187.

It is only in those cases where it clearly appears that the ultimate fact found is based upon and educed from findings of probative facts, and it is plain that the latter do not justify or support the ultimate fact found, that the findings of probative facts will control that of the ultimate fact, and so bereave the judgment of support. The enunciation and application of this rule is to be found in the cases of People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 76, 22 Pac. 474, 475, 15 Am. St. Rep. 22, and Geer v. Sibley, 83 Cal. 1, 23 Pac. 220. In the Reed Case, which was an action to secure a judgment adjudging a certain strip of land in the city of San Jose to be a public street of said city, the position of the city being that it had been so dedicated by certain acts of the owners of said strip, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment because the ultimate fact of dedication was obviously predicated upon, but not supported by, certain probative facts previously found. The finding of the ultimate fact read in part:

> "That, by the acts, facts, and matters above found and recited, said premises referred to and described were by said several parties dedicated," etc.

The court said:

> "It may be that if this finding had stood alone, and had not been put in this argumentative form, it might have been upheld as a sufficient finding of an ultimate fact. But this cannot be so where the facts are fully found, and the general finding of a dedication is expressly drawn as a conclusion from such facts. Counsel say it does not appear that the court found all of the facts proved. But it does appear from the finding itself that it was based entirely upon the facts found, and not, in whole or in part, on facts proved but not found. Therefore, if the specific facts found do not support this one, which is a summing up of the others, the judgment should be reversed."

In Geer v. Sibley, supra, precisely the same proposition arose, the trial court having founded its findings of the ultimate fact upon findings of probative facts showing that the defendant, rather than the plaintiff, was entitled to judgment; the latter having prevailed in the court below. See People v. McCue, 150 Cal. 198, 88 Pac. 899.

In the case at bar, the gravamen of the plaintiff's charge against the bank is that it and Robbins "willfully, maliciously, and with intent to defraud plaintiff conspired and confederated together to induce plaintiff to sell his interest in the order for a sum very much below its real value, by concealing from plaintiff all knowledge of the fact that Bowers had offered to pay said order, and to apply the money to be received from Bowers on account thereof to the payment of the debt due from Robbins to the bank."

The court found, as above shown, that the foregoing allegation was not true in any respect, and that, while the bank gave the plaintiff no information of any of the facts characterizing the several transactions affecting the order from Stilwell to the plaintiff and Robbins and the money finally realized thereon, "it never by any act or statement concealed any knowledge from plaintiff."

There is nothing perceivable in the probative facts found, as an examination of them will readily affirm, which shows that the bank entered into a fraudulent scheme or in any manner or measure connived with Robbins in the defrauding of the plaintiff of his just share of the money which constitutes the subject of this controversy. There is, in other words, no statement among the probative facts from which the conclusion is forced that the bank's part in the transactions relating to the Stilwell order and the money realized therefrom was characterized by fraud, or malversation of any character.

[3] There are but two propositions deducible from the probative facts found by the court from which any implication of bad faith on the part of the bank in the transactions concerning the Stilwell order could by any possibility arise, and they are: (1) The fact that, in said transactions, the bank dealt entirely and solely with Robbins; (2) that the bank at no time in or during the several negotiations involving said order consulted the plaintiff or gave him any information with respect to those transactions. But we know of no rule of law which required the bank, under the circumstances as disclosed by the findings, to inquire of the plaintiff whether Robbins' acts concerning said order and the money finally received thereon were sanctioned by him or not. The order and the money constituted the property of a copartnership of which Robbins was a member. He had the legal right to deal with the order and the money and to dispose of them even to the satisfaction of his individual indebtedness, if that course were sanctioned by the plaintiff. And there is nothing in the mere fact that he did so dispose of the order and the money that would be sufficient to generate in the bank even a suspicion, much less a substantial reason to believe, that thus he was acting in bad faith with his partner or attempting wrongfully to appropriate or divert the property to his own individual purposes, to the detriment of his partner. Of course we do not mean to say that one partner has the right to misappropriate the partnership property or funds, for he has no such right, and, where he does do so, the other partner has, as is well illustrated by this case, his redress against the defaulting member of the firm for the wrong so committed. But what we do say is (to repeat) that, where a partner is dealing with a third party respecting partnership money or property, the latter has the right to assume that such partner is acting in perfect good faith toward, and with full authority from, his partner or partners with regard to the transaction, and that, because it may appear that the transaction, when consummated, will result solely to the benefit of the partner conducting it, constitutes no ground for the implication of fraud on the part of such partner upon the other partners in thus disposing of or handling the partnership assets. There is therefore, in this case, nothing in the mere transactions themselves relating to the Stilwell order which would tend to suggest to the bank fraudulent conduct of Robbins in said transactions toward the plaintiff, and hence there was no obligation cast upon the bank by the mere transactions themselves to prosecute an inquiry, before the consummation of the transactions, to ascertain whether they were authorized or sanctioned by the plaintiff, or, if carried out, they might or would work a fraud upon the partnership rights of the plaintiff.

But the fact is emphasized that the findings disclose that the bank communicated to Robbins alone the proposal of Bowers to take up the Stilwell order, furnishing the plaintiff with no information relating thereto; that the bank, so it is asserted, loaned Robbins the $500 with which he purchased the interest of the plaintiff in the Stilwell order; that the bank made false statements to the plaintiff concerning the payment by Bowers of the note given by him in exchange for the Stilwell order, after that transaction had been consummated, for the purpose of circumventing discovery by the plaintiff of the fraud of which said note was one of the consequences. These facts, it is vigorously urged, disclose that the bank had knowledge of the fraudulent character of the several transactions, and that they, reinforced by the fact of the unauthorized pledge of the Stilwell order to the bank as security for Robbins' individual indebtedness to it, are sufficient to destroy the force or impeach the legal integrity of the ultimate finding exonerating the bank from any fraudulent participation in the transactions culminating in the fraud upon the plaintiff.

As to the first of the propositions thus advanced, it is in the first place to be observed, as in effect we have before declared, that there was no legal or moral duty resting upon the bank to inform the plaintiff of the offer of Bowers to take up the Stilwell order as indicated. So far as the findings disclose the circumstances of that transaction, there is nothing therein indicating but that, so far as the bank had any knowledge on the subject at the time of Bowers' offer and its acceptance by Robbins and the bank, the plaintiff had been given information of and acquiesced in it. Indeed, so far as it appears to the contrary, at the time of the acceptance of Bowers' offer by Robbins, the bank was justified in assuming that that transaction was known and agreeable to the plaintiff; it having been accepted by his partner. In the second place, the court does not find (see finding 8, supra) that the bank communicated to Robbins the offer made by Bowers. What the court does find is, as will be noted, that Bowers made an offer to purchase from the bank the securities, including the Magnesite Company's note, pledged by Stilwell to the bank, and also to give his note for and in lieu of the Stilwell order to Robbins & Breeze, and that the bank and Robbins accepted the offer. Whether, as to the order, the offer was made both to Robbins, and the bank or to Robbins alone cannot be determined from the finding, but it may be assumed that, since the bank was interested in the order as a pledge to secure Robbins' indebtedness to it, the offer as to said order was made to the bank as well as to Robbins; still this fact alone constitutes no evidence of fraud, or if there was fraud at the bottom of Robbins' connection with the offer and its acceptance, so far as they concerned the order, that the bank knew of it or had any reason to believe the transaction to be so tainted. It is true that the finding declares that neither Robbins nor the bank at any time communicated to the plaintiff information concerning the offer and the acceptance thereof, but it obviously cannot be concluded from that fact that the bank, at the time of the execution of the transaction or when the offer was made, had knowledge or reason to believe that the plaintiff had not been fully apprised of the proposition by his partner, Robbins.

[4] The statement by the plaintiff that the bank loaned to Robbins the money wherewith he bought his interest in the Bowers note is not supported by the record. The finding as to that circumstance is, as will be perceived, that, while W. H. High, the manager of the bank, performed the physical act of delivering it to the plaintiff, said money was in point of fact loaned to Robbins by his father. But it is urged that said finding must be disregarded, for the reason, so it is asserted, that the denial by the bank in its answer that it loaned the money paid by Robbins for the plaintiff's interest in the note is so phrased as to carry with it an admission that the bank did make the loan of said money to Robbins; that is, that said denial involves a negative pregnant. Upon this appeal, however, it being on the judgment roll alone, that point cannot be of any avail to the plaintiff. Presumptively the question whether the bank did or did not advance the $500 or any part thereof to Robbins under any circumstances was treated as an issue at the trial, and presumptively there was sufficient evidence to support the finding upon that issue. Peck v. Noee, 154 Cal. 351, 354, 97 Pac. 865. But, even if it were true that the bank loaned the money to Robbins to be used for the purpose of buying Breeze's interest in the order, it is clear that that circumstance would not tend to show that the bank was thereby guilty of fraud in the transaction, since there is no finding that the bank had knowledge of the purpose for which the money was to be used. But the court did expressly find that the bank had no knowledge at any time prior to the 12th day of April, 1907, that the plaintiff had not received from Robbins, for his interest in the order, a consideration in addition to the said sum of $500.

[5] The charge that the bank, after the purpose of the fraud had been accomplished, made false statements to the plaintiff with a view to forestalling and preventing discovery by him of the fraud is not borne out by the findings. The only finding bearing upon that proposition is finding No. 16, and therein the court finds, as will be observed, that the plaintiff, having for the first time on the 6th day of May, 1907, discovered that the Stilwell order had been paid by Bowers, at once made inquiry of both Robbins and the bank whether or not Robbins knew that Bowers was going to pay the order before the plaintiff had sold and assigned his interest in said order to Robbins, and that both Robbins and the bank denied that Robbins had knowledge of such fact before the time when plaintiff made such assignment. There is no statement to be found in the findings that the bank deliberately made a false statement to the plaintiff as to Robbins' knowledge of Bowers' intention to pay the Stilwell order or his note given in lieu thereof at or before the time that the plaintiff assigned his interest in said order to Robbins. For all that appears to the contrary from the findings, the bank might have in good faith believed that Robbins had no such knowledge at the particular time referred to. Besides, whether the bank did or did not make a false statement with regard to that matter involved a question of evidence, and whether the circumstance, even if true, possessed great or little or no significance in support of the charge of fraud against the bank, constituted a proposition, the solution of which was solely with the trial court.

While thus we have taken the pains to show that there is no real inconsistency between the probative and the ultimate facts found by the court, it has been an unnecessary task, since, as before stated, and as is plainly manifest from an examination of the findings, the ultimate fact is not drawn from the findings of probative facts or in any degree dependent upon them.

From the views of the findings above expressed, it results that, upon this appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone, the finding that the bank had no hand or took no part in the fraudulent acts by means of which the plaintiff was wrongfully deprived of his interest in the Stilwell order can rest upon the presumption, which must be indulged when the appeal, as here, is not supported by a bill of exceptions or statement or other duly authenticated record of the evidence, that there was received into the record evidence sufficient to justify and support it.

[6] There is, however, another point made by the plaintiff of which brief notice only is required. It is contended by him that Robbins held the plaintiff's interest in the Stilwell order as a constructive trustee for the plaintiff, inasmuch as Robbins obtained said interest through fraud; that, this being so, the plaintiff is entitled to follow and recover from the bank the money received into its hands from the sale of the plaintiff's interest in the order, since, so the argument proceeds, the bank, notwithstanding that it might have been a purchaser thereof in good faith and without notice, was not a purchaser for value, inasmuch as it applied the money so obtained to the payment of a pre-existing indebtedness. The contention is that the satisfaction of a pre-existing indebtedness, owing to the vendee, does not constitute a valuable consideration. As upholding that contention, plaintiff cites a number of cases from other jurisdictions. Precisely what the cases referred to hold upon that proposition we need not here pause to inquire, for, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, it is firmly settled by our own decisions that the cancellation of an antecedent debt, due the vendee from the vendor, for the sale of property, does constitute a valuable consideration. See the following cases: Payne v. Bensley, 8 Cal. 266, 68 Am. Dec. 318; Robinson v. Smith, 14 Cal. 98; Naglee v. Lyman, 14 Cal. 454; Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 342; Davis v. Russell, 52 Cal. 611, 28 Am. Rep. 647; Sackett v. Johnson, 54 Cal. 107; Gassen v. Hendrick, 74 Cal. 444, 446, 16 Pac. 242; Foorman v. Wallace, 75 Cal. 552, 17 Pac. 680; Russ v. Muscupiabe, 120 Cal. 521, 52 Pac. 995, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186.

In Naglee v. Lyman, supra, the court, expressing its views through Mr. Justice Field, said:

> "All the authorities, however conflicting in other respects, concur in the rule that where there is change in the legal rights of the parties in relation to the antecedent debt, the creditor taking the collateral security is considered as a holder for value, and the paper not subject to equities existing between the original parties" —that is to say, where the creditor so takes such security in ignorance of the existence of such equities.

All the other cases above cited to this point confirm and reaffirm the rule as it is thus stated.

Our conclusion is that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. HOGE. (Cr. 337.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 14, 1914.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 519*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS.

If a confession was voluntary, the fact that defendant was under arrest and in custody, and that the confession was made in answer to questions, does not render it inadmissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Otho J. Hoge was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. McDonald, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Appellant herein was convicted of the crime of robbery. He appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

If the testimony hereinafter mentioned was properly admitted, that testimony, together with the other evidence in the case, is sufficient to support the verdict. The only question requiring attention on this appeal relates to the admissibility of an alleged confession by the defendant.

According to the testimony of witnesses for the prosecution, the defendant, on the 8th day of November, 1913, was under arrest at the city jail of the city of Los Angeles, charged with the offense in question. The defendant was taken to the office of the witness Flammer, the captain of detectives, and the alleged confession was made in the presence of Mr. Flammer and Police Officers Williams and Winn and the witness Wright, a shorthand reporter. The testimony shows that questions were asked of the defendant by Mr. Flammer, and that the defendant did not hesitate in answering the questions, and that no threats or promises were made to induce him to make those answers. The substance of the admissions made was that the defendant bought a revolver and gave it to one Kennedy, and arranged with Kennedy that Kennedy would come to a room occupied by the defendant and one Cibulski and rob Cibulski, at the same time pretending to take money from the defendant. Kennedy carried out this plan and obtained $50 from Cibulski.

Flammer further testified, as witness for the defendant, that before the reporter came into the office there had been a conversation of a few minutes between the defendant and the three officers; that in that conversation the defendant "admitted that he did frame up this hold-up and had it carried out, and then he answered those questions freely; it was an ordinary conversation," that in this first conversation the defendant answered the questions freely and did not hestitate. The witness Williams, as witness for the defendant, testified that the defendant said that "he wanted to tell us all about it."

The rule is well established that a confession extorted by threats or resulting from inducements held out by the officers of the law to a prisoner in their custody is not admissible in evidence; that when such a confession is offered in a criminal case it is incumbent on the prosecution to lay the foundation for its introduction by preliminary proof showing prima facie that it was freely and voluntarily made. People v. Soto, 49 Cal. 67. But the mere fact that the defendant is under arrest and in the custody of officers, and that the alleged confession is made in answer to questions, will not authorize the rejection of such confession, if it fairly and clearly appears that the statements of the defendant were of a voluntary nature. The case at bar stands in strong contrast with those of People v. Quan Gim Gow, 23 Cal. App. 507, 138 Pac. 918, People v. Borello, 161 Cal. 367, 119 Pac. 500, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 434, and People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

HOPS v. POE. (Civ. 1311.)

TIME (§ 4*)—COMPUTATION—"YEAR."

Local Option Law (St. 1911, p. 600) § 4, requires the certification by the clerk of a petition complying with the law for submission of a local option question to an election, and declares that, if the petition shall be certified, the governing body of the territory shall call an election to determine whether the sale of liquors shall be licensed therein or not. Section 6 provides that, if the petition shall be certified as sufficient within 6 months and not less than 40 days before the holding of the next general state or general municipal election within the territory, the question shall be then submitted; otherwise, a special election shall be held within not less than 30 nor more than 60 days after the petition has been certified as sufficient, provided that no election under the act shall be held within 2 years of any previous election held under the act within the same territory. Held that, while the term "year," when used in a statute, ordinarily means a period of 365 days, as provided by Pol. Code, § 3257, and would be so construed with reference to special local option elections held under such act, the meaning of the word is in all cases dependent on the subject-matter and the connection in which it is used, and it may mean a period of 12 months, a political year, or a period between two elections, a year of office, a school year, a fiscal year, or excise year, a year of age, or a theatrical season, and, as used in the statute authorizing the submission of such question at general elections, means the period elapsing between one general election and another; and hence the fact that such period lacked 2 days of being 2 years of 365 days each did not prevent the submission of the question on a petition otherwise filed in proper time.

Application for writ of mandamus by John Hops against A. W. Poe. Decree for petitioner.

Ben Berry, of Stockton, for petitioner. Will A. Dower, of San Andrea, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to require respondent, who is the county clerk of Calaveras county, to file a petition for an election to determine whether the sale of alcoholic liquors shall be licensed in the Fifth supervisorial district of said county. There is no question raised as to the sufficiency of said petition or that it was executed with the formality required by the statute; but respondent claims that to file said petition at this time would require an election to be had on the proposition at the approaching general election on November 3d, and that this election would be illegal by reason of the fact that the same question was submitted at the last general election held November 5, 1912, less than 2 years prior to said November 3.

Section 4 of "An act to provide for the regulation of the traffic in alcoholic liquors by establishing local option" (Stats. 1911, p. 599) directs the clerk, within 10 days after filing such petition, if he is satisfied it is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, to so certify in writing, and, furthermore said section provides:

> "If the petition shall be certified as sufficient, the legislative or governing body having jurisdiction over the territory described therein shall, within the time prescribed herein, call an election to be held in such territory to vote upon the question whether the sale of alcoholic liquors shall be licensed therein."

And section 6 provides:

> "If said petition shall be certified as sufficient within six months and not less than forty days before the holding of the next general state or general municipal election within the territory therein described, such question shall be submitted at said general state or general municipal election; otherwise a special election to vote upon the question shall be called to be held within not less than thirty nor more than sixty days after the petition has been certified as sufficient: Provided, that no election under this act shall be held within two years of any previous election held under this act within the same territory."

It thus appears that, if respondent had filed the petition as requested on July 29, 1914, it containing the requisite names, he would have been required to certify it within 10 days thereafter, and, said date being within 6 months and not less than 40 days before the holding of the next general election, it would follow from the statute that such question should be submitted at that time. The vital point in the contention of respondent is thus shown to be that the interval of time between the general election of 1912 and that of 1914 does not constitute the period of 2 years. Going one step further, he claims that since an election, if had upon the question on November 3d, would be illegal, it would be an idle and futile act for respondent to file said petition within said period specified as above.

It may be doubted whether the respondent, being a mere ministerial officer, is in a position to urge such defense to justify him in his refusal to file said petition; but the materiality of the defense, if sound, is conceded by petitioner, so we proceed to inquire whether there would be any infraction of the law if the supervisors should require the same question to be submitted again at the approaching general election.

It is to be observed that the statute contemplates that the question may be submitted at a general or a special election. In either event, the interval must be at least 2 years. This, of course, is to secure reasonable permanency and to avoid unnecessary expense. The policy of the law is plain and salutary. The statute should be construed so as to give effect to this manifest and wholesome purpose. If the question is submitted at a special election, no one, of course, would contend that the sense of the electors could again be taken on the proposition until 2 years of 365 days each had passed; but where the first vote is taken at a general election, which occurs on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, we think the more reasonable and beneficent interpretation of the law justifies and demands the conclusion that another vote may be taken at the next general election to be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November of the second year following. In other words, when the statute uses the term "year" in connection with general elections, the political year is clearly contemplated; but in referring to special elections, since no particular day is specified, the Legislature intended to designate the year of 365 days.

Ordinarily, the term "year," when used in a statute, means a period of 365 days. Section 3257, Pol. Code. "But its meaning in all cases is dependent upon the subject-matter and the connection in which it is used, and it may mean a period of 12 months, beginning on a day other than the 1st of January, or it may mean a political year, or a period between two elections, a year of office, a school year, a fiscal year, or excise year, a year of age, or a theatrical season." 38 Cyc. 310.

As far as this case is concerned, for the purpose of determining the question before us, we may consider the statute as though no provision were made for a special election. We may also incorporate into the statute the date of the general state election, which is fixed by law. No additional element is thereby injected into the provision in question, but the legislative intent may be made more apparent. The statute would then read:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "If said petition shall be certified as sufficient within six months and not less than forty days before the holding of the next general state election on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November within the territory therein described, such question shall be submitted at said general state election: * * * Provided, that another election on the same question shall not be had within two years thereafter."

If the foregoing were the only provision, it would probably not be seriously contended that four political years must elapse before another election could be held, although the second general election should occur two days less than two calendar years from the first election. But we do not see that the problem is complicated by the additional provision as to special elections as we are dealing with the term "two years" as applying only to general elections.

It may be said that the only cases in point cited by counsel uphold petitioner's contention. In McNeely v. Commissioners of Town of Morganton, 125 N. C. 375, 34 S. E. 510, the statute authorized an election on the first Monday in May to determine whether or not license should be granted in the town of M. for the sale of spirituous liquors by small measure. The act further provided for a resubmission of this question every two years, and it seems that an election was held on the first Monday in May, 1897, and another in 1899, but the first Monday in May, 1899, came two days earlier in the month than in 1897. It was therefore contended that two years had not passed, but the Supreme Court of North Carolina said:

> "But the act provided for the election to be held on the first Monday in May—the same day of election for municipal officers. We think this controls the time. It is like electing members of the Legislature every two years—elections to be held on the first Tuesday in November, which may not be precisely two years, if we count the days. In fact, the Legislature has changed the time of this election from November to August, and, if the plaintiff's contention should be sustained, it would invalidate that election."

Battle Creek Brewery Co. v. Supervisors, 166 Mich. 52, 131 N. W. 160, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 946, involved the construction of the local option law of that state, providing that the license question should be submitted at the time of the general election and containing this provision:

> "Provided, however, that such proposition having been once submitted and decided either way, by a majority of the votes of the qualified electors in any county in this state, voting thereon, the same shall not be again submitted in such county within a period of two years next thereafter, but may, at any time after the expiration of such period upon a like petition and action, be again submitted, and so on, at the expiration of not less than two years after every such election."

It seems that one vote was taken at the general election held April 5, 1909, and the question was again submitted at the general election held April 3, 1911. And it was contended there, as here, that the two years had not expired, two days being lacking. One of the justices agreed with that contention, declaring the election to be void and basing his construction of the law upon the rule of interpretation provided by the statute of that state:

> "In the construction of the statutes of this state, the following rules shall be observed, unless such construction would be inconsistent with the manifest intent of the Legislature: The word 'month' shall be construed to mean a calendar month, and the word 'year' a calendar year."

The opinion of the court, however, concurred in by all the other justices, was as follows:

> "The period of two years mentioned in the proviso to section 5420 is to be interpreted in connection with the amendments fixing the date of the election at the date of the general election for township officers, etc., and the law is to be construed as though the amendments were part of the original act. It was manifestly the intention of the Legislature that the result of the election should not be disturbed for two years; not that it should be final for two years at times, and three years at other times, as the time between the first and third general elections might be two years or a day or two less than two years. I am therefore of the opinion that the two years referred to are political years, and not calendar years. Inhabitants of Paris v. Inhabitants of Hiram, 12 Mass. 262; McNeely v. Commissioners of Morganton, 125 N. C. 375, 34 S. E. 510."

The only substantial difference between the statutes thus construed in the two foregoing cases and the one before us is that here the question may also be submitted at a special election. The interests of the people, however, demand, and no doubt it was the intention of the Legislature, that as far as practicable the question should be submitted at the general election, and in such case we can see no good reason why it should not be held that it is fully two years from one general election to another.

Harrison v. Roberts, 145 Cal. 173, 78 Pac. 537, was clearly a different case. There the first vote was taken at a special election held December 4, 1902, and the second proposed vote was to be taken at the general election to be held November 8, 1904, and it was justly held that between these two dates the period was not two years—the matter relating to the proposed amendments to the charter of San Francisco.

We think it a reasonable construction of the statute and in the interests of the taxpayers to hold that the clerk should file the petition; and it is so ordered, and, in accordance with the stipulation of the parties, the remittitur will issue forthwith.

PEOPLE v. FORD. (Cr. 253.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 10, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 9, 1914.)

1. Criminal Law (§§ 125, 126*)—Change of Venue—Grounds—Affidavit.

The affidavit on motion for change of venue in a murder case alleged the existence of friendly relations between the person slain and the district judge, that the former had been a popular public official, and that there existed a highly inflamed condition of the public mind prejudicial to defendant, but failed to state any facts disclosing that any passion or prejudice or any disposition to prejudge the merits had been shown. It also alleged that the person, in connection with whose affairs the killing took place, was a rich landowner, widely known in the county, but did not show how such facts could interfere with a fair trial. Such allegations as could possibly have been material were met by counter affidavits. A jury was obtained with apparent ease without defendant having exercised all his peremptory challenges. Held, that the application for a change of venue was properly refused.

2. Criminal Law (§ 134*)—Change of Venue—Requisites of Affidavit.

An application for a change of venue in a criminal case for local prejudice and bias of the trial judge must be supported by an affidavit which not only states facts, as against conclusions, but states facts establishing, to the satisfaction of a reasonable mind, that a fair trial cannot be had.

3. Homicide (§ 169*)—Evidence of Conspiracy—Admissibility.

Under an indictment charging several with murder in the language of the statute, evidence of a conspiracy between such persons is admissible to show the circumstances under which the homicide was committed, and that the acts were unlawful in the commission of which the killing resulted.

6 Criminal Law (§ 814*)—Instructions—Issues.

Where, in a prosecution for a murder committed at a meeting of hop pickers who were on a strike, the legal right of the hop pickers to strike was not in issue and could furnish no justification for the killing, the court properly refused to instruct on the legality of the strike, though the tragedy remotely had its origin in the strike, and but for the strike there would have been no occasion for the presence at the meeting of the officers who were killed.

7. Homicide (§ 7*) — "Murder" — Malice — Murder in Second Degree.

Any unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought, express or implied, "when no considerable provocation appears," is murder, under the express provisions of Pen. Code, § 187, and by section 188. Where there is no evidence of any considerable provocation, malice will be implied.

10. Criminal Law (§§ 409, 531*)—"Confessions"—"Admissions."

A distinction exists between "admissions" and "confessions." A confession is a voluntary declaration made by a person, who has committed a crime, to another, of the agency or participation he had in the same, and is restricted to the acknowledgment of guilt, but an "admission" of a fact, not in itself involving criminal intent, is not to be rejected as evidence, without preliminary proof, merely because it may, when considered with other facts, tend to establish guilt.

14. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

An instruction stating that a doubt justifying an acquittal must arise from a want of sufficient evidence to convince the jury of the truth of the charge was not erroneous for failure to add "beyond a reasonable doubt," where the jury were plainly told in other instructions that they could not convict until the evidence convinced them beyond a reasonable doubt.

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 785*)—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—TESTIMONY OF WITNESSES.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Richard Ford was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Royce and Austin Lewis, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. An indictment was returned September 8, 1913, against the defendant for the murder of E. T. Manwell on the 3d day of August, 1913, at the county of Yuba. On October 30, 1913, H. D. Suhr was indicted, and still later, November 4, 1913, William Beck and Harry Bagan were jointly indicted, all for the same crime. By stipulation all the defendants were tried jointly. Beck and Bagan were acquitted, and Ford and Suhr were convicted of murder in the second degree, and each was sentenced to imprisonment for life in the state's prison. The record in case No. 253 presents the appeal of defendant Ford from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. By stipulation the appeal of defendant Suhr (No. 254) is to be heard upon the transcript brought up in No. 253.

1. On November 28, 1913, defendant Ford made a motion "for an order transferring this cause to some convenient county for trial, and that some judge other than the Honorable Eugene P. McDaniel hear the same." The ground of the motion was that the defendant cannot have a fair trial in Yuba county "by reason of the bias and prejudice and high feeling against the said defendant, and that the said judge, by reason of bias and prejudice, is disqualified from hearing said cause. Said motion will be based upon the affidavit of said defendant Richard Ford." A like motion was made on behalf of defendant Suhr, supported by his affidavit, alleging substantially the same facts as were set forth by defendant Ford, and both motions were heard at the same time. On behalf of the people, counter affidavits of E. B. Stanwood, district attorney, and Eugene P. McDaniel, judge of the superior court of Yuba county, were read in resistance of the motion. Both motions were denied.

The affidavit of Ford states:

That Manwell, district attorney, and one Reardon, deputy sheriff of Yuba county, died of gunshot wounds; that Sheriff Voss, a deputy sheriff, and Constable Anderson were beaten and injured; that two of the hop pickers were killed, and the arm of a man by the name of Nielsen was shot off by Deputy Sheriff Daken; that Manwell was widely and favorably known in the county and was a personal friend of Judge McDaniel; that District Attorney Stanwood was a personal friend of Manwell and was his assistant district attorney, and the present district attorney is a son of Manwell; that said sheriff and Daken and Anderson were very popular in the county; that on August 2, 1913, the employés on the Durst hop ranch, near Wheatland, some 2,300 in number, had protested against the unsanitary and intolerable conditions of the camp, specifying the particulars as to such conditions; that Ford was selected by the hop pickers as spokesman to present their grievances, and at about 5 o'clock on Sunday, August 3, 1913, said employés were holding a peaceful meeting on said ranch, and said sheriff, Anderson, Armstead, Reardon, and others, with Manwell, some of whom were armed, entered said assemblage; that a disturbance ensued, and, as to the fatal results and the responsibility therefor, the facts are in dispute; that Durst is a large landowner, rich and widely known; that later eight persons were arrested at Wheatland and were taken to Marysville by the state militia, "to prevent being lynched by the people of Yuba county, and the people of Yuba county are biased and prejudiced against said defendant"; that District Attorney Stanwood has arrested many persons "without bringing them before a magistrate for periods running from 30 days to 3 months with the approval of the community," and that detectives were employed who made efforts to compel said persons so arrested "to swear to facts tending to convict some one of murder"; that the issues of fact at the trial of defendant involve the general condition of labor on ranches in the county, and the veracity of said Durst and said sheriff and constables and other officers and their acts are involved in the case; that said Stanwood is widely known in said county and has many personal friends, and the propriety of his conduct and his fitness for his office are also issues in the case: "that Yuba county is a rural county, and the people generally know one another, and most of the people know all of the aforesaid parties" and are the friends of said parties; that the witnesses for the prosecution are many of them residents of said county and well and favorably known, and this defendant, and many of his witnesses are strangers in said county and unknown, and "some of defendant's witnesses are afraid to come to Marysville to testify in defendant's behalf."

District Attorney Stanwood made affidavit:

That he is well acquainted throughout the county and with the people thereof. That since said August 3, 1913, he has had charge of the prosecution of defendant, has interviewed witnesses and conducted the investigation up to the present time. That affiant has tried many of the criminal cases and mingled largely with the people of said county, "and at no time has affiant discovered or learned of any sentiment or prejudice among the people of Yuba county against any defendant," and affiant, on information and belief, "alleges the fact to be that there is in Yuba county, and among the people thereof, no prejudice or bias against said defendant whatsoever," and defendant "can have in said county, before any jury that may be selected, an absolutely fair and impartial trial." That there is and was nothing in the relationship between affiant and said Manwell or that existing with his son, or any other reason or cause, "which has biased or prejudiced this affiant against defendant, nor does this affiant at this time entertain the slightest bias or prejudice against him." That nothing in affiant's friendship for Sheriff Voss in any way affects affiant to defendant's prejudice, and affiant says that he is informed and believes that said Sheriff Voss at no time has entertained any bias or prejudice against defendant, and it is a fact that said sheriff and said deputies referred to in defendant's affidavit are well and favorably known in the county, "but there is nothing in said acquaintanceship or knowledge which in any way has biased or will bias or prejudice any of the people of said county against defendant upon his trial in the above-entitled action or in any way at all." That two companies of militia were, shortly after August 3, 1913, called to the scene of the killing for the purpose of restoring peace and order thereat, and for no other purpose. That eight or more persons arrested at said time were escorted to Marysville by certain members of the militia solely for the reason that there did not happen to be at hand sufficient peace officers for that purpose. That, however, they were not so escorted for the purpose of protecting them from violence; and, as a matter of fact, there was no manifestation of any ill feeling or violence against any of said persons or against any person, at or after the killing of said Manwell and Reardon, by any of the people of said Yuba county. That affiant "has caused several persons to be arrested and confined for a certain time, and thereafter has caused several persons thus arrested to be released after a full and fair investigation." That certain detectives were employed, but at no time did affiant "do or advise the doing of any act or acts, except as were entirely necessary, legal, and proper in the premises." Affiant denies that the issues of fact at the trial can be made to involve any general or other condition of labor on the ranches of Yuba county, and he denies that the involving of such conditions would in any way tend to prejudice any of the people of Yuba county against the defendant. That affiant has known Judge McDaniel intimately for 20 years, and since said August 3, 1913, "he has frequently heard said judge make expressions concerning matters involved, and which necessarily will become involved upon the trial of said action. That at no time has he heard said judge express any sentiments directly or indirectly tending to show the existence in his mind of the slightest bias or prejudice against the above-named defendant or his case, * * * and affiant alleges that said judge is in no way biased or prejudiced against said defendant, and defendant can have before him an absolutely fair and impartial trial."

Judge McDaniel made affidavit:

That Manwell was personally known to and a friend of affiant. That nothing in the acquaintance of affiant with Manwell "in any way affects affiant as such judge, and the same in no way produces in the mind of affiant any prejudice towards the defendant in this action. Affiant, as such judge, can sit and preside upon the trial of this action as fairly and as unbiased as he could in any criminal action whatsoever. * * * Affiant has at no time had, nor has he now, any bias or prejudice against defendant, either resulting from affiant's friendship for said Manwell or from his sharing in any general sentiment of the community in said Yuba county, or for any reason or in any way at all. Affiant has no knowledge at this time of the existence of any prejudice or feeling among the people or the community in said Yuba county against defendant." That nothing in affiant's acquaintance with and friendship for Sheriff Voss can in any way affect affiant as a judge or will have any bearing on his actions in said case or in any way cause any prejudice or bias in the mind of affiant against defendant. That he has read the affidavit of defendant, and that "neither from any matters in said affidavit set out nor for any cause or reason whatsoever does he entertain any bias or prejudice whatsoever against the defendant."

[1, 2] There is much in Ford's affidavit concerning the intimate and friendly relations existing between the district attorney and the judge and the parties named that might be said in almost any criminal case arising in the county. The popularity of an official can hardly be taken as evidence, certainly not as conclusive, that a fair and impartial trial could not be given a defendant who had assaulted or even killed such official. Ordinarily, where there is an existing highly inflamed condition of the public mind prejudicial to a person charged with crime, it finds some manifestation through the public press, or by assemblages of the people in the neighborhood of the scene of the crime, and, if general, in other parts of the county. We have here no evidence that the people of Yuba county had, even to a limited extent, shown any feeling of passion or prejudice toward Ford or any of the defendants or had manifested any disposition to prejudge the merits of the case. Ford's statement that such was the condition of the public mind towards him is but his conclusion which is expressly denied by the counter affidavits. In People v. Findley, 132 Cal. 304, 64 Pac. 472, the court said:

> "It is not sufficient, in a case of this kind, to allege in the affidavit simply that the defendant 'believes that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial,' etc., but it must be made to appear by the affidavit or affidavits on file that a fair trial cannot be had before the judge about to try the case, by reason of the bias and prejudice of such judge. Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 4. The affidavit or affidavits must not only state facts, but the facts stated must establish, to the satisfaction of a reasonable mind, that the judge has a bias or prejudice that will in all probability prevent him from dealing fairly with the defendant."

The same is true in respect of alleged bias and prejudice of the people at large. Some facts should appear which would convince a reasonable mind that the opinion of the affiant is well founded.

A jury was obtained apparently without any great delay or difficulty, and defendant did not exercise all the peremptory challenges to which he was entitled.

The statement that the case involved the general condition of farm labor and wages in the county carries with it no inference that the subject will in any way cloud the real issues in the case or be likely to prejudice farmers, should any of that class be chosen as jurymen, against the defendant. Besides, the counter affidavits deny that any such issue would be involved, and we cannot see that it could have been, as in fact it was not. Nor can we attach significance to the statement that Mr. Durst "is a large landowner, and a very rich man and widely known in Yuba county." There is no showing that his wealth or that the knowledge of the people of the county had of him could in any way have interfered with defendant's having a fair and impartial trial.

Without noticing in further detail the averments of Ford's affidavit, we think such of them as have any essential bearing upon his claim that he could not have a fair and impartial trial in Yuba county or before Judge McDaniel are substantially controverted in the counter affidavits. The facts presented in a similar motion, in People v. Suesser, 132 Cal. 631, 64 Pac. 1095, were so very different from the facts here shown as to make that case of little value in the determination of the present question. We think the order denying the motion for a change of the place of trial was rightly made.

[3] 2. Some questions are discussed in appellants' brief that may be disposed of before reaching the more important contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. For a proper understanding of defendant's points now to be noticed, it may be stated that there was no evidence that Ford fired the shot which resulted in Manwell's death, although the confession of Suhr might give rise to an inference that he may have done so. The contention of defendant is thus stated:

> "As it is admitted that neither Ford nor Suhr fired the fatal shot [we find no such admission as to Suhr], it was very important to correctly charge as to the illegality of the acts or words from which it was sought to hold them guilty of Manwell's death. The acts and words we submit should have been pleaded. The question as to their illegality was one of law for the court. The issue of fact was: Were the acts done or words spoken, and what was their effect or result?"

As we understand defendant's position, it is that defendant was at most engaged in conducting a strike, which was not an unlawful act, or that, if he was committing a trespass, it was but a misdemeanor; that, whatever his acts or his words spoken which may have led to the killing, they should have been alleged, and as his acts and words concerned only an undertaking not unlawful, or, if unlawful, was but a misdemeanor, the killing, as matter of law, must be held not to have been murder in either degree; that, unless defendant's acts and words constituted a felony, he could not be held for murder because they resulted in the death of some one, and at most his offense would be manslaughter because lacking the essential elements of murder. It is hence contended: First, that evidence of a conspiracy was not admissible and cannot be considered because the conspiracy was not pleaded; and, second, that evidence which fell short of showing a conspiracy to commit a felony would not support the verdict. We confess to some difficulty in discovering precisely defendant's contention, but have given it as we understand it. The indictment was for murder and was charged in the language of the statute. We entertain no doubt as to the admissibility of evidence of a conspiracy under such an indictment, where the murder was committed while the conspirators were engaged in the consummation of some other unlawful act. Proof of the conspiracy is not made to establish another and distinct crime (that is, conspiracy as such), but to show the circumstances under which the homicide was committed, and that the acts were unlawful in the commission of which the killing resulted. People v. Brown, 59 Cal. 345, and People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 92 Pac. 861, were cases (many others might be cited) where the charge was murder and evidence was taken of a conspiracy to do an unlawful act.

[4] Upon the question of the responsibility for the acts of the conspirators, we conceive the law to be that where one person unites with one or more other persons in an enterprise to commit an unlawful act, whether a felony or misdemeanor, with the intention to withstand all opposition by force, and is present aiding and abetting the deed, and murder is committed by some one of the party in pursuance of the original design, or the unlawful act results in death, he is guilty as the principal or immediate offender. State v. Nash, 7 Iowa, 347, 350; Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898, 3 Am. St. Rep. 320. In the Spies Case it was said (122 Ill. at page 177, 12 N. E. at page 951, 3 Am. St. Rep. 320):

> "Where persons combine to stand by one another in a breach of the peace, with a general resolution to resist all opposers, and, in the execution of their design, a murder is committed, all of the company are equally principals in the murder, though, at the time of the act, some of them were at such a distance as to be out of view, if the murder be in furtherance of the common design."

At page 225 of 122 Ill., at page 974 of 12 N. E. (3 Am. St. Rep. 320), it was said:

> "A man may be guilty of a wrong which he did not specifically intend, if it came naturally or even accidentally from some specific, or a general, evil purpose. When, therefore, persons combine to do an unlawful thing, if the act of one proceeding according to the common plan terminates in a criminal result, though not the particular result meant, all are liable."

And again:

> "There might be no special malice against the party slain nor deliberate intention to hurt him; but if the act was committed in prosecution of the original purpose, which was unlawful, the whole party will be involved in the guilt of him who gave the blow. Where there is a conspiracy to accomplish an unlawful purpose, and the means are not specifically agreed upon or understood, each conspirator becomes responsible for the means used by any conspirator in the accomplishment of the purpose in which they are all at the time engaged."

And it was held in Ruloff v. People, 45 N. Y. 213, 217:

> "This general resolution of the confederates need not be proved by direct evidence. It may be inferred from circumstances; by the number, aims, and behavior of the parties at or before the scene of action."

See People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 394, 77 Pac. 177.

The principle governing conspiracies is well stated in People v. Brown, 59 Cal. 345, 352, and, although the conspiracy there was to commit a felony, we do not think that the grade of the crime involved in the conspiracy is material, if the act or design is unlawful. It was said in People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 335, 92 Pac. 861, 863:

> "But whether or not the act committed was the ordinary and probable effect of the common design, or whether it was a fresh and independent product of the mind of one of the conspirators, outside of, or foreign to, the common design, is a question of fact for the jury (citing cases), and, if there be any evidence to support the finding of the jury on this question, its determination is conclusive."

[5] It was not the theory of the prosecution, as claimed by defendant, "that every labor leader is responsible for all the acts of striking workmen, and that each labor leader can be tried under an indictment baldly stating that the said labor leader has personally done a specific thing, in this case murder, whereas, in fact, it is sought to hold him responsible for the act of another." The theory of the prosecution was that Ford, as the leader in this instance, was engaged in the unlawful act of resisting arrest by a peace officer armed with a lawful warrant, and that by his words and acts he incited the persons then under his leadership to aid and assist him in such unlawful act, and that Manwell met his death through the act of one or more of these conspirators thereunto induced by Ford. Appellant cites subdivision 2, § 192, of the Penal Code, and People v. Munn, 65 Cal. 215, 3 Pac. 653, to show that instruction numbered 48, presently to be noticed, was incorrect and to establish the proposition that the killing of Manwell was at most but manslaughter The section of the Code defines involuntary manslaughter to be:

> "In the commission of an unlawful act, not amounting to a felony; or in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death, in an unlawful manner, or without due caution and circumspection."

In the Munn Case:

> "The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder of the second degree. The evidence showed that he struck the deceased two or three blows with his fist, from which death ensued. It was not shown that he intended to kill deceased, but the court instructed the jury that he was liable for all possible consequences of his act. Held, error." Syllabus.

In that case the court quoted the language of Chief Justice Shaw in Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 305, 52 Am. Dec. 711, as follows:

> "This rule is founded on the plain and obvious principle that a person must be presumed to intend to do that which he voluntarily and willfully does in fact do, and that he must intend all the natural, probable, and usual consequences of his own act."

The instruction given by the trial court stated the rule correctly to a certain point, but added that, if the act intended was unlawful, the defendant would be responsible "for all the consequences, even the possible consequences." The instruction (numbered 48) given in the present case was as follows:

> "I instruct you that, where several persons conspire or combine together to commit any unlawful act, each is criminally responsible for the acts of his associates or confederates committed in furtherance of any prosecution of the common design for which they combine. In contemplation of law, the act of one is the act of all. Each is responsible for everything done by his confederates, which follows incidentally in the execution of the common design as one of its probable and natural consequences, even though it was not intended as a part of the original design or common plan."

This instruction is taken from a statement of "the rules of law governing the criminal liability of each of several parties engaging in an unlawful conspiracy or combination," said by the Supreme Court in People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 334, 92 Pac. 861, 862, to be "an apt statement of them (the rules), abundantly supported by authority," and found in 8 Cyc. 641. Appellant replies that in the Kauffman Case the conspiracy was to commit a felony (robbery), and hence the case does not apply here. Appellant's error is in assuming that a distinction is made between conspiracies to commit misdemeanors and conspiracies to commit felonies. In short, his position is that a homicide perpetrated in furtherance of a conspiracy to commit a felony is murder, but that a homicide perpetrated in furtherance of a conspiracy to commit a breach of the peace, or to resist an officer in the discharge of his official duty, is nothing more than manslaughter. The law recognizes no such distinction. Sufficient of the evidence, tending to show that the unlawful act was in furtherance of which the murder was committed, will be hereafter stated.

[6] In this connection appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give the following instructions:

> "I charge you, as matter of law, that a strike is lawful."
> "I charge you, as matter of law, that a boycott is lawful."
> "I charge you, as matter of law, that one or more men have a right to quit work for any reason, or no reason, or a frivolous reason, singly or in a body, and peaceably to picket, and peaceably to request or persuade others to do so, and to request others to assist them in so persuading and so picketing."

It is urged that, under the instructions given, the jury might have assumed that striking or picketing or boycotting was an unlawful act, and, to prevent such assumption by the jury, defendant was entitled to have the instructions given. There was no evidence that the killing occurred while the conspirators were in the act of striking, picketing, or boycotting. There was evidence that many of the hop pickers quit work Sunday morning on their part a strike; that a boycott was declared and was in operation early in the day against certain businesses being carried on in the camp—a store, a restaurant, a near-beer booth, and a shooting gallery.

Manwell was killed at a meeting of hop pickers held about 5 o'clock of that day under circumstances which will hereinafter be more fully set forth. Suffice it at this point to say that, while it may be assumed that the hop pickers were assembled at this meeting originally to consider or talk over their grievances, it soon, under the leadership of Ford, took on altogether a different complexion. He made it known to the people that the officers of the law were approaching with an intention to arrest him, and he called upon his followers to stand by him and prevent his being taken. This they did promptly upon the coming of the officers into their midst, and there quickly followed, not only Manwell's death, but other tragic and fatal happenings which showed that the sole purpose of the actors was to prevent Ford's arrest at all hazards. The tragedy may be said to have remotely had its origin in the strike; that is, if there had been no strike, there might have been no officers there, and no occasion for their being there. But, so far as the strike and the occurrences of the earlier part of the day are concerned, they became collateral to the events happening at 5 o'clock and immaterial to the issue being tried. See People v. Conkling, 111 Cal. 616, 44 Pac. 314. The legal right of the parties to strike was not an issue and furnished no justification for killing Manwell in their effort to protect their leader, Ford, from arrest.

[7] Appellant presents a still further phase of this contention. He says that the verdict acquitted him of murder in the first degree; that there is no evidence warranting a conviction of manslaughter, and hence there remained only murder of the second degree, of which he could have been convicted, but "that the only possible justification for a verdict of murder in the second degree would have been evidence that Manwell was killed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate some felony other than arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or mayhem, but there is absolutely no evidence of any perpetration or attempted perpetration of any felony whatsoever." The answer to this view of the law seems to be quite obvious. Murder in the first degree is specifically defined, "and all other kinds of murders are of the second degree." Pen. Code, § 189. Manslaughter is not any kind of murder. So there must be murders which are not murders in the first degree. "Murder is the unlawful killing of a human being, with malice aforethought." Section 187, Pen. Code. Any unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought is murder. The degree has nothing to do with the definition. But "such malice may be express or implied. * * * It is implied when no considerable provocation appears." Section 188, Pen. Code. If, then, the killing of Manwell was done in the absence of "considerable provocation," malice is implied, and we have the very case provided for by the statute. It will be observed that the statute makes no distinction between cases where the killing was in the perpetration of a misdemeanor and of a felony. It says "all other kinds of murder are of the second degree"; that it, the unlawful killing of a human being with malice (express or implied) aforethought is murder, and the killing is equally unlawful whether done in the perpetration of a misdemeanor or felony.

[8] 3. It appears that on Sunday, August 3, 1913, there were at the Durst ranch, near Wheatland, about 2,000 or 2,500 people of several different nationalities, men, women, and children, gathered there to pick hops. The hop picking had begun about the middle of the preceding week. The unsanitary conditions surrounding these laborers, and some unnecessary hardships to which they were subjected in the performance of their work, naturally aroused a feeling among them of dissatisfaction, which manifested itself first in an open manner at meetings on Saturday, August 2d. That the movement towards a strike had taken shape at that time is shown by certain telegrams sent by defendant Suhr; defendant Ford being with him. There were nine of these telegrams, each signed by Suhr, sent through the Western Union office at Wheatland during Sunday, August 3d, the first at 5:54 a. m. to T. W. O'Brien, 238 South California street, Stockton, reading:

> "Strike on at Durst Bros. Twenty-five hundred out. Send literature at once. Notify Sacramento."

He telegraphed:

> "To Secy Local 73, 1117 3rd St Sacramento Cal.: Strike on at Dursts twenty-five hundred out Send books and due stamps and delegate if possible at once."

In the afternoon, at 2:40 of the clock, he telegraphed:

> "To I. W. W. Hall, 3345 17th street, San Francisco: Strike on in full demands turned down. I. W. W. ordered off the grounds but are here to stay. Send all speakers and wobbles possible. Money needed, lots of families destitute, boycott all employment sharks. Answer."

It appeared at the trial that the term "wobbles" meant members of the I. W. W. He sent at the same time a message, reading the same as last above, "To Secy Ryan, Local 71, I. W. W. Hall, Sacramento;" also one "To Secty. B. Sodder, I. W. W. Hall, San Pedro St., Los Angeles;" also one to I. W. W. Hall, Tenth street, Oakland, reading the same; and a similar one to "T. W. O'Brien, 228 So. Cal. St., Stockton;" also to Otto Gantz, I. W. W. Hall, 822 F. Street, Fresno; also one:

"To San Francisco Bulletin, San Francisco. Twenty-five hundred hop pickers out on strike at Durst Bros. ranch. Thirteen hundred to come on Horst Co. ranch to-morrow. Strike conducted by I. W. W. Send reporter to take news."

Much testimony was admitted describing in detail the conditions existing at the Durst hop fields. We do not think it necessary to set out this testimony. It showed a situation calling for some radical reform measures in order to make it a desirable place for such numbers of people to work, both in respect of their moral and physical well-being. Bad as these conditions were, however, they furnished no justification for the tragic events of that Sunday and need not be dwelt upon. Ford was the leader and spokesman of these hop pickers. He conducted their meetings, of which there were several, during Sunday before the 5 o'clock meeting at which Manwell was killed. There was a meeting on the previous Saturday evening, largely attended, as these meetings generally were; the attendance estimated by some of the witnesses as 1,500 or 2,000—"nearly the entire camp," as one witness expressed it. The usual place of meeting was a platform slightly elevated from the ground and situated in the midst of the camp, near to the store, restaurant, and some places of amusement. These meetings were in the main orderly, but plainly disclosed Ford's mastery and power to lead and control the more or less excited and turbulent body of persons comprising a considerable part of the assembled masses of striking and disappointed people, looking to their leader for guidance and relief. Suhr's telegrams show that it was an I. W. W. movement. In the earlier part of the day Constable Anderson made an effort to arrest Ford, but being challenged to produce a warrant, and not then being able to do so, and after some rather rough handling by persons around Ford, he desisted, but later a complaint was sworn to before a justice of the peace at Wheatland, and a warrant was duly issued thereon and placed in Anderson's hands. The situation finally became so threatening that Sheriff Voss, of Yuba county, was sent for. He came to Wheatland, and with him Deputy Sheriffs Reardon and Matthews. At Wheatland he was joined by District Attorney Manwell, Constable Anderson, Henry Daken, and A. W. Armstead, the two latter deputized as part of the posse. Robert Durst was also with them. They went to the Durst ranch in two automobiles, arriving together about 5 o'clock Sunday afternoon, driving near to where a largely attended meeting was in progress. Sheriff Voss directed Daken, Armstead, and Matthews to remain on the outside of the crowd. Sheriff Voss, Constable Anderson, Deputy Reardon, and District Attorney Manwell entered the crowd and went towards the platform where Ford was standing and had been speaking. Sheriff Voss' account of what happened is brief. He testified:

"We arrived there at the hop yards, and I got out of the machine and started towards the crowd; and I got up close to the crowd and held up my hand and told them I was sheriff of Yuba county and 'in the name of the people of the state of California, I demand you to disperse.' I can't remember the very words that I used, but that is the sum and substance of it; and I hardly got through talking when I noticed a commotion at one side, and I saw five or six men jumping on Constable Anderson * * * over there, and I hadn't taken but one or two steps when I was stunned by something hitting me on the head, and the next thing I remember I was turned and facing in the opposite direction, and that is all I know about it."

He testified that up to that time he had not heard any shots fired. He was asked if he saw anything of the deceased, Mr. Manwell, and replied:

"Yes, sir; as I started over there I saw Mr. Manwell away over there about 10 or 15 feet I judge from where I was, and he had his hand up in the air. * * * Q. Now, did you see Mr. Manwell again after you last saw him there, as I understand you, facing the crowd with his hand up? A. After I came to I saw him laying on the ground. Q. Was it near where you saw him with his hands up? A. About the same place. * * * Q. Did you draw your pistol or revolver there at that time at all? A. No, sir."

He testified that his revolver was taken from him, and it was gone "when he came to"; that, when he started towards Anderson, he drew his policeman's billy, but he had no chance to use it, and it was gone also.

Constable Anderson is the only other survivor of the four officers who entered the crowd. Manwell and Reardon were shot and almost instantly killed. Constable Anderson testified that, after the sheriff had told the crowd to disperse, he observed that "Ford jumped down off the box," and Anderson stepped into the crowd to find him and—

"came right onto him. Q. Let us be particular about that now. A. He was all kind of crouched up like that (showing), and when I stepped in there I was surprised to see him so quick, * * * and I said, 'Here, I have got that warrant you were talking about;' and he backed off, and as he backed off he said, 'Hey, hey, hey;' and I said, 'None of that,' and reached to grab him, and as I grabbed hold of him I hollered to the sheriff—I glanced that way (showing)—and said, 'Here Sheriff, here is the man we want.' And as I said 'Sheriff,' why, I was hit. * * * I came to laying on the ground. * * * The next thing I remember * * * I threw my hand down right quick, and as I did I felt the shock of a shot in my arm here. Q. At the time you were shot you were on the ground? A. Yes, sir."

He was asked how long it was from the time Ford cried "Hey, Hey, Hey," until he was struck.

"A. It seemed like the same time that I said 'Sheriff' it seemed the same time I was hit. * * * It would seem from the time that he said 'Hey, Hey, Hey,' it seemed that they all looked around and the crowd milled around me, and I grabbed him, and I said, 'Here, Sheriff, is the man we want;' and I was hit; it took just about that long."

Deputy Daken was one of the posse left on the outside of the crowd. What he saw from his standpoint he testified to as follows:

"I had orders from Mr. Voss to stay on the outside of the crowd; I and Mr. Armstead and a man named Matthews. We stood there as Sheriff Voss and Mr. Durst and Mr. Reardon and Ed. Manwell and Lee Anderson walked into the crowd, and, as they walked in, Mr. Anderson said to the sheriff, he said—while the sheriff had his hand up he said, 'As sheriff of Yuba county, I demand peace;' and also Mr. Manwell had his hand up, and he said, 'Keep the peace, boys, keep the peace;' and about that time Mr. Anderson reached over and said, 'Sheriff, here is our man;' and he reached for Ford; and at that time they all commenced to beating with clubs and rocks and beat them down; and when I saw that there was no chance to get in there I said to Mr. Armstead, 'I am going to break this crowd up if I can;' and I fired a shot over their heads, and the shooting commenced in general, and I fired the second shot before the crowd opened, and when they opened I observed the bodies laying on the ground. Q. How did you fire the second shot? A. Over their heads; and I saw a Porto Rican. He was beating Mr. Voss with a club, and I took it to be a police billy. It looked to me like it, and I hollered to him to 'cut it out,' and he kind of looked at me and offered to strike again, and I shot him; and at that the crowd kind of surged and were throwing rocks and clubs and hitting me all over, and I looked and saw a man come in from behind with a club that I recognized as Nelson afterwards, and yelled to him to stop, and he kept coming, and I shot. I shot him through the left arm, if I remember right, and my shells were exhausted, and I made my way for the store. Q. Now, Mr. Daken, you were standing there on the ground, and the officers had gone in. Can you give me a picture of what happened in there before you fired that first shot over their heads there? Tell it in detail. A. My fellow officers were all beaten down before I fired the shot; that is why I fired it. Q. Who were down? A. They were all down, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Voss, Mr. Manwell, Mr. Reardon. Q. And up to this time no shots had been fired? A. No, sir. Q. Did you see the sheriff fall? A. I did. Q. You have given us the sheriff demanding peace and the district attorney asking for peace. Did the district attorney make any gesture? How was his hand? A. He held his hand up, and, if I remember right, he had a cigar between those two fingers (indicating). Q. Did you see the defendants, or any of them, at that particular time? A. The only man I saw was Ford. As we drove up he was speaking, and he stepped down off the box as the posse walked in. Q. Did you see Ford at the time the sheriff and district attorney, Mr. Manwell, had their hands up asking for peace? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where was Ford at that time? A. He had just stepped down off the box."

A large number of witnesses, both for the prosecution and defense, testified to their recollection of what they saw and heard after the sheriff's posse arrived, and, as is not unusual, there was some conflict in this testimony. It was not clearly or satisfactorily shown who killed Manwell or Reardon or who shot Constable Anderson. Defendant claims that Manwell was shot by a hop picker, known as the Porto Rican, with the gun he knocked out of Anderson's hand—a witness so testified. But, if such was the fact, it does not relieve defendant from his responsibility, for the Porto Rican was one of the confederates, all of whom, who were engaged in the original design, were equally guilty. Many details were brought out corroborative of the testimony given by Voss, Anderson, and Daken and some important facts not seen by either Voss or Anderson, who were down at an early stage of the fray. It is not necessary to go further into this phase of the case. It was clearly shown that the two officers were killed and Sheriff Voss and Constable Anderson beaten down into insensibility, the latter also shot and seriously wounded, by persons in the crowd which Ford had around him, and by persons who, as we think will appear from the testimony, were actuated in so doing by the encouragement given them by Ford and his influence over them. There were, as the testimony showed, 15 or 20 shots fired—some witnesses said 30—and it was shown that 2 of these were by Daken who fired over the heads of the crowd, with the third shot he killed the Porto Rican, and the fourth he fired at one of the crowd who was armed and approaching him, as he thought, in a hostile manner. All the other shots came from Ford's confederates. The important and vital question in dispute is: Does the evidence fix the responsibility for these fatal events, with reasonable certainty, upon Ford? To this question we will next address the inquiry.

At the Saturday night meeting Ford was the speaker. Witness Jameson testified to some of his utterances. Being asked what Ford said, he replied:

"As I came up he was talking, and he said, 'The conditions here are hell;' and he said, 'If you people want to live in hell, you can, but for my part I don't want to live in hell.'"

One of the persons present made some protest—

"and quite a number wanted to make him [the intruder] shut up, and Ford said, 'Let him alone; it is only disturbing my meeting.' He said: 'There is no use of them sending any tin-horn scissor bill officers after me with stars on them as big as tin cans. They can't get me. If they get me, they have got to have guns, and they can't get me then.'"

The expression "scissor bill officer" and "scissor bill boss" occurs frequently in Ford's speeches and in responses sometimes by his audience, but no explanation was given of its meaning; that it was an epithet showing hatred is manifest.

Witness Earl Smith was running a restaurant at the camp. The platform where the people mostly assembled was near by. He testified to a meeting at the platform about half past 9 or 10 o'clock Sunday morning at which Ford was the speaker. That he read from a paper or had read the demands of the strikers in various languages. One of the crowd said, "It is better for every one to stand together, stick together." That later they went to Durst's office. At about half past 1 or 2 o'clock the hop pickers met again at the platform. At the close of the meeting Ford said:

> "Before we adjourn our mass meeting, I have a few words to say. 'Now,' he said, 'I ask everybody to stand loyal to our demands;' and he said, 'If the scissor bill boss don't meet our demands by 10 o'clock tomorrow, he will go up in smoke;' and he said, 'Now, it is up to you people whether the scissor bill officers from Wheatland comes out here and arrests me or not;' he said, 'If they do come, I hope you tear them into dog meat;' and the crowd cheered and said, 'Yes, make mince meat out of them;' and he said, 'Now, we are going to adjourn our mass meeting; anybody that wants to know anything or any information about the strike report at the I. W. W.'s.'"

This place was a frame building 12x14, called the Bull Pen, at the hop yards, and about 50 steps from Smith's restaurant. Smith further testified that Constable Anderson came to his place between 10 and 11 o'clock, from the store—

> "and there was a large crowd following him and talking, and some said 'Hop head,' and 'You big soak,' and so on, and I came out of the restaurant before Anderson was at the pumping plant, and I said, 'Get in the rig, Lee, and I will take you to town; they are liable to murder you.' * * * There was a big posse of people after him around the restaurant at that time, and Mr. Durst came around the south side of the restaurant and motioned to Lee and said, 'Come on and I will take you to town;' and they got in the machine and started to town, and they throwed rocks and said, 'You big hop head,' and 'You big soak,' and 'We will learn you to come out here and meddle with other people's business; we will teach you.'"

Witness Alvin James was at a meeting in the forenoon of Sunday at which the demands of the hop pickers were stated by Ford to Durst; that Durst agreed to most of the terms, but not all, and refused the demand of $1.25 per hundred for picking. The witness testified that when Durst left he heard Ford say that their demands had been refused, and continued:

> "I want all of you that is in any way interested in this now to stand loyal to what I have said and done, and we will see that he comes through with these demands."

About 12 o'clock the people came together again, the witness said, about 1,500 of them, and Ford and some others were appointed a committee to see if Durst would come to their terms, and later Ford reported that he had refused, "and he told them the only other thing was to see that no other pickers came—to boycott all outside pickers."

Witness Phillips testified that he passed the crowd at a meeting about 11 o'clock and heard Ford say:

> "'The officers may get me yet.' He said, 'If they do, I don't care a tinker's dam.' He said, 'If you people have any nerve, that you will stand by me.'"

Witness Howard was present when Constable Anderson came into the camp, and heard some one in the crowd say:

> "'There is one of the scissor bill s— of b—; now let's get him.' I heard Blackie Ford say, 'If we will stay together, we will stay on the grounds;' and that the I. W. W. had money enough to feed all the hop pickers, and that they would start a free lunch."

Witness L. K. Smith testified that he was at a meeting about 1 o'clock and heard Ford addressing the crowd—

> "something about the scissor bill officers and the scissor bill boss and the constable not to take him. And one of the fellows out in the crowd, in reply to that statement, he said that they would mob them if they did. Q. Mob who? A. The boss or the constable."

Witness Frank Stineman testified that he was at the meeting about 10 o'clock Sunday and heard what was said to Durst and his reply, and was at the meeting when the committee returned from Durst's office. He testified:

> "About 2 o'clock I heard the crowd yelling and went to see what was going on. The crowd was running around. They seemed to be like a bunch of wild people, and Ford was running around with a bunch following behind him, * * * and Ford was talking to them all the time, telling them to stand loyal and they could not take him."

Witness Lewis McCurry testified that he was at one of the meetings about half past 1 or 2 o'clock Sunday. He testified:

> "I thought I would stop and hear what he (Ford) was going to say, and I heard him say, 'Let the officers fire the first shot, and then they would finish it.'"

Deputy Sheriff Daken was at the hop yard Sunday morning and was at the 10 o'clock meeting at the platform and heard Ford speaking and reading resolutions. He testified:

> "I heard Ford say at the morning meeting, 'Don't let them take me.' He was speaking to the crowd in general."

There is much other testimony tending to show that the hop pickers very generally were wrought up to a high state of excitement and had placed their confidence in Ford to lead them successfully in securing better working conditions and better pay, and, when they assembled at 5 o'clock in large numbers, they were, at least many of them, in such temper that not much was required, as was soon demonstrated, to induce them to resort to acts of criminal violence.

At this 5 o'clock meeting Ford was in charge and was the speaker and leader, as he had been throughout the day, and it appeared very clearly that the officers were expected any moment. Witness Alvin James was present. Speaking of the coming of the officers, he testified:

> "Just before the automobiles drove up, or as they were coming in, Ford said, 'Well, boys,' he said, 'the sheriffs are coming, and I suppose they will get me;' and he said, 'I don't care a tinker's dam whether they do or not, but if you are loyal to this cause, and want to see that this thing is carried through, you will stand by me;' and I don't know how many said, 'We will knock their damn blocks off if they come in here.'"

Witness R. R. Jameson was present at this meeting and testified:

"Q. Did you hear any statements made by Ford prior to the sheriff's coming up? A. The only statement I heard, otherwise than I have said, Blackie Ford said, 'Stand your ground,' or something like that. I couldn't catch all of it, but he said, 'Stand your ground,' just as the officers were coming up."

Witness J. J. Hicks testified to what he heard and saw at this meeting:

"Q. Tell us what, if anything, you heard Ford say. A. The first I heard him say was: They heard they had sent after the sheriff, something to that order, and he guessed they would come after him, and he said, 'Here they come now, and it is up to you fellows whether they take me or not;' and some of them said, 'They won't take you.' Most of them hollered that, and some of them said, 'We will cut them into dog meat first.'"

Witness L. K. Smith was present at this meeting. He testified:

"When we got there some one said, 'Here they come;' and Ford held up his hands and talked to the crowd and said he 'hoped they would stand loyal and not let them take him,' or words to that effect."

Witness Chester Cass testified:

"Well, I left Wheatland and got there just about the same time the sheriff landed there; and as I got there some one was speaking up above the crowd. I could see him. I don't know who he was. He had both hands out, and said, 'Stand your ground.'"

The principles of law already to some extent pointed out, it seems to us, are clearly applicable to the case here presented, and that the jury were fully justified in finding defendant Ford guilty as a principal in the murder of Manwell, although he did not himself fire the fatal shot. The conclusion of the jury that the unwarranted attack upon the sheriff and his assistants while in the execution of a lawful duty, resulting in the death of a deputy sheriff and Manwell, was the direct result of Ford's acts and conduct was, we think, fully justified by the evidence.

[9] 4. We are next to notice the evidence so far as it tended to connect defendant Suhr with the killing. We have already given the telegrams sent by him Sunday, August 3d, showing that he was one of the organizers and conductors of the strike and boycott. Witness Magruder testified to being present at a meeting of the hop pickers held about noon of the 3d of August, and heard some talk about Durst not agreeing to the terms demanded.

"He said he 'would not give the dollar and a quarter but would agree to everything else'; and they took up a collection to find out to see what they could do to send messages, and while I was sitting there a little while afterwards there was a collection, and one man came up; I don't know his name; I didn't know until I came in here— Q. (interrupting) Do you know now? A. Yes, I know now; that gentleman there. Q. Which one? A. Suhr. He said, 'Blackie, I have $33.' * * * Mr. Suhr came, and there was a man had a shooting gallery opposite me (one of these target shooting games), and this man came and said: 'You shut that up. We will not have any target shooting on the ranch. There is a boycott on the ranch.' Q. Who said that? A. Mr. Suhr, and this man that had the gun place, he said, 'I will give you 25 per cent. of what I take in if you let me shoot this afternoon;' and Mr. Suhr said: 'You don't take me for a 25 per cent. man, do you? You have got to shut up.' And that evening the shooting gallery moved away, and he continued to say everything else would be closed up on the Durst ranch. Q. Who said that? A. Mr. Suhr said that; it looks like the man. Q. In your opinion, is this the same man? A. Yes, I believe it to be the same man."

Four witnesses testified to certain admissions or confessions made by Suhr, which will next be stated.

Witness Francis Heenan, deputy sheriff of Yuba county, testified to a statement made to him by Suhr. The witness had been sent to the Sutter county jail, where Suhr was confined, to bring him to Marysville for the purpose of identifying some one. The statement was made on the way from the courthouse in Yuba City to the Northern Electric depot, where they got on the cars, some time about the middle of October, 1913. The witness was examined and cross-examined, from which it appeared that Suhr had not been asked to make any statement; that no promises or inducements were held out to him or threats or coercion in any manner used; and that the statement was—

"freely and voluntarily made. Q. What was the statement? Tell the jury. A. Well, he first spoke up and said, 'I wish they would take me out and shoot me or give me life imprisonment; I can't stand this thing;' and I asked him what was the matter, and what was the trouble; and he said, 'About that shooting down at Wheatland.' Q. Tell it all. A. I asked him what kind of a gun he had; and I said, 'There has been a couple of guns missed down there that we never got track of;' and he said, 'A small one;' and I asked him what make it was; and he said he didn't know; and I asked him where he got it; and he said he took it out of an old man's hand; and that was about the extent of the conversation. * * * Q. Have you given all of the statement to the jury which Mr. Suhr gave you? A. No. Q. Give it all then. A. Well, since you call my attention there, he spoke about taking a couple of shots at the officers; and I asked him, if I recollect right, if he knew the names of the officers; and he said, 'No, they were officers,' or words to that effect. Q. Anything further? A. Yes, I asked him if he hit anybody; and he said he 'saw one of them fall—one of the officers fall.' Q. Where were you and Mr. Suhr at the time he made this statement to you? A. Walking from the courthouse to where we could catch the car, walking along the street."

On cross-examination he testified that it was half a minute or a couple minutes' walk to the car from the courthouse, and that they walked along without stopping; that he had no further talk with Suhr on the way over to the courthouse nor on returning.

H. O. Brown, a witness for the defense, testified that he measured the distance from the Sutter county courthouse "to the first turn where Heenan and Suhr took the street car" and found it 320 feet.

Witness Bennett Schillig, deputy sheriff of Sutter county, testified to a statement made by Suhr on December 2, 1913, at the time the Ford case was set for trial. The witness was at the time undersheriff and in charge with the sheriff of the jail where Suhr was confined. He testified that no inducement or promise of immunity or reward for making the statement was given him, and that "no coercion or duress or anything of that kind to make him make the statement" was used. He was asked to give the statement verbatim to the best of his recollection.

"A. It was on the evening of the 2d. Q. Of December? A. Yes, sir; and about between 8 and 9 o'clock. It was about 8 o'clock. It was my custom to go into the jail and lock Mr. Suhr into his cell. When I first went in he complained to me about the postponement of these cases, and we had some little talk about that; and he asked me my opinion about it and about the cases; and I told him I didn't know anything about the facts of the matter down there; and we had some little conversation in regard to Ford. Q. Tell us all of it, as nearly as you can. A. He told me on other occasions that he was not well acquainted with Ford; in fact he said, 'We were not good friends while we were at Wheatland, not very good friends;' and that night when I was in there I said, 'Herman, I thought you told me you and Ford were not very good friends at Wheatland;' and he wanted to know why; and I said, 'I noticed your greetings in the sheriff's office at Yuba county;' and I said, 'I thought Ford greeted you like a long lost brother;' and he said, 'Ford is not a bad fellow;' and he said, 'I used to get sore at him down there.' Mr. Royce: Never mind what he said about their not being— Mr. Carlin (interrupting): I am not particular about it. Tell us about the shooting, what he said about it. Mr. Royce: All right, go ahead. It will all come out anyway. A. I am trying to repeat it as I have it in my mind; you will get me mixed up. Mr. Royce: It is my fault. A. Anyway, in that remark I mentioned if he thought it was a good idea to be tried with the other defendants; and he said he didn't know; and I said, 'Perhaps Ford was more guilty than you, and it might have a bad effect on your case.' And he said, 'I am in worse than Ford;' that 'Ford did not have any gun;' and I said, 'Did you have one?' and he said, 'Yes;' and I said, 'Herman, I don't know what to say about it; I did not know any facts of the matter.' He said, 'I will tell you;' and he said, 'When the officers drove up, we were there at the platform;' and he said, 'The officers got out and come towards the platform, and the first I knew'— He said, 'There was a man stepped up on a box, or something, he thought; it looked to me as though a man stepped on a box or bench, and it broke down. The man went down, and the trouble started.' And the confusion was such that he couldn't tell who any one was. He didn't know any one there in town, didn't know any of the officers, but he was trying to get out through the crowd, and as he passed some old man he handed him a pistol, and he said, 'Young fellow, defend yourself.' He took the pistol and fired it; he didn't know exactly how many times. He said he might have fired a couple of times, he didn't know, and he felt a stinging in his arm, and he got out of the crowd and went to some camp. He had been shot in the arm some place, he didn't know the place, but I think it was near the elbow, as near as I recall; but there at the camp some lady bandaged this wound, and he started out and went down to the river, and when he got to the river he said, 'I thought to myself, "What am I running away for?" I will go back.' And, as he started back and had gone a little ways, he met Ford and some others. I don't remember now; I have forgotten; but it was either—"

At this point some discussion was had between counsel, after which the witness resumed the narrative:

"A. Well, he said he thought, 'I have nothing to run away for; I will go back.' And he met Ford and these other parties. Q. State what he did, not what he said. The Court: If he stated anything further as to what he himself did, state it. A. Then he turned back and caught a freight train that was crossing the bridge, and he rode on that freight train to Roseville, and from Roseville he got a motor car and went into Sacramento, and it was too late to get a train for Stockton, and he remained all night in Sacramento and went home the next day to Stockton; and it was either the next day after or the second day, I don't know which, that there was some article come out in the papers in regard to Suhr and Ford wanted for murder, and he was somewhat alarmed about it, and he left there and went up into Tuolumne county, I believe it was, a timber camp where there was some 75 or 80 men working, and he worked in the kitchen as dish washer and waiting on the table, and he worked there about a month, and he got to thinking the matter over, and he thought he would come back to Marysville and surrender himself and quit his job; that he told the foreman who he was and why he was quitting, and he got back to Stockton, and there he saw some more articles in the papers in regard to the inhuman treatment that the prisoners were receiving in Yuba county; that they were compelled to lie on the floor, and their bodies were covered with sores, and he changed his mind about coming to Marysville, and he concluded that he would go on to Arizona or to Mexico or some place to get out of the way for a while, and he started at that time. I can't remember all the details of his trip down there. He was several days going to Arizona, and he was arrested there and brought back. Q. Was there anything by him said about the name he used in camp in Tuolumne county? A. Well, he said that he used a different name; I can't recall whether it was there at Tuolumne or at Arizona that he used a portion of his own name. He didn't use all of his name; just a portion of it."

Witness Ben Manford testified to a statement made by Suhr on Sunday morning, December 14, 1913. Isaac Smallwood was a deputy sheriff and had charge of the jail at Yuba City, and Manford went there to see Smallwood on some business. He had no official connection with the jail, but was a constable or marshal. He found Smallwood with Suhr "in a little room in front of the cell," and "wanted to see him to give him a book to collect some taxes." Smallwood was talking to Suhr.

"Mr. Carlin: Q. We have already brought you up in your testimony wherein you stated—I believe you said that on the 14th of December of last year Mr. Suhr, the defendant here, made a statement to you in the county jail at Yuba City. Now give the jury all that was said by him and you at that time, as near as you can recollect it. A. I walked in the jail that morning hunting for Mr. Smallwood; and I said, 'Good morning, gentlemen;' and I said—I see this man in there and I said, 'You just as well be in this morning as out; it is a bad day;' and said, 'Are you from Live Oak?' and he said, 'No;' and Mr. Smallwood said,

> 'That man gave bail and went back;' and said he was in for murder. Q. What man? A. Mr. Suhr. Q. All right, this man said what? A. He said, 'I am held for murder in the Wheatland riot;' and I said, 'How is that? Did you just happen to be standing around?' and he said, 'I had been there two or three days waiting for work and for my family;' and he said, 'This riot took place;' and he said, 'Some man handed me a gun, and I fired two shots at two men;' and I turned and walked out. Q. You did? A. Yes, sir; I did, and Mr. Smallwood walked out. Q. Is that all that was said? A. Yes, sir; that is all I heard said."

Smallwood testified:

> "I am night man over there, deputy sheriff, and by instructions of Sheriff Noyes to look after things there, and I make it a point to go around once in a while to see that everything is O. K., and that Sunday morning I was there and said good morning to the gentleman. Q. To Mr. Suhr? A. Yes, sir; and he said, 'Hello, Ike, how are you?' and I said, 'Pretty fair;' and by that time Mr. Manford came in. Q. And before Mr. Manford's arrival you and the defendant Suhr—had you and the defendant Suhr had any conversation or talk at all concerning the subject-matter, concerning the statement he made to Mr. Manford? A. No, sir; none whatever. Q. Had he and you been talking in any way at all about the case that he was in jail on—on the charge? A. No, sir. Q. In no way? A. In no way. Q. Did you hold out to him there at that time—hold out to the defendant Suhr any promise of reward or inducement to cause him to make a statement? A. I never did. Q. Did you ask him to make a statement? A. I never did. Q. Did you exercise or was there exercised at any time in your presence any coercion or duress to cause the defendant to make a statement? A. Never did. Q. Did anybody else in your presence? A. No, sir. Q. Did Mr. Manford hold out any hope of reward or promise or use any duress? A. No, sir. * * * Q. Now, did the defendant Suhr at that time and place, in the presence of yourself and Mr. Manford, make a statement concerning his complicity in the Wheatland shooting which resulted in the death of Mr. E. T. Manwell? Tell the jury what the statement was. Mr. Royce: State the whole conversation. Mr. Carlin: Yes, sir. The Witness: Word for word? Mr. Carlin: Yes, sir. A. I can't, word for word. Q. As near as you can. The Court: Give your best recollection. A. The best recollection was when Mr. Manford came back he said, 'Good morning, Ike;' and I said, 'Hello, Ben;' and he stepped up and looked around and said, 'Good morning,' to Mr. Suhr; and he said, 'Are you here yet?' and he said, 'Yes, I am here;' and the conversation led on; and he said, 'Yes, I am in here regarding the Wheatland riot;' and he said, 'I didn't know that;' that is what I understood Mr. Manford to say. Then I understood Mr. Manford to say, 'Is that so?' and he said, 'Yes;' that is as near as I can remember it; and I understood him to say—Mr. Royce (interrupting): We will object to what you understood him to say. The Court: Your best recollection. A. In my best recollection Mr. Suhr said, 'I grabbed the gun and fired;' and I understood him to say he grabbed it from an old man; and then there was another word or two passed, I didn't catch it; and I said, 'Ben, I have got to be going;' and he said, 'All right.' That was the marshal. And that is about all that I heard. Q. Was there anything said there about shooting at anybody? A. I heard him say he fired. * * * Q. Have you stated all that you remember? A. All that I remember, outside of Mr. Suhr speaking to the marshal that he was expecting his family there."

Suhr testified in his own behalf. As to the conversation with witness Heenan, he testified that he had none that he can remember. His testimony as to the statement made to witnesses Smallwood and Manford was:

> "Well, Mr. Smallwood came in there and talked to me, and we were talking about the weather, and another fellow came in there and said, 'Good morning' (presumably Manford); he said, 'You are better off inside than out;' and I said, 'I am not;' and he said, 'What are you in here for?' and I said, 'On account of the Wheatland trouble;' and he said, 'Did you have any gun, and did you do any shooting?' and I said, 'I didn't;' and that was all that was said, and they walked out."

Of his conversation with witness Schillig, he testified as follows:

> "When we left the courthouse I said to Mr. Schillig that I was going to buy a piece of tobacco, and I went to the store and bought a piece of tobacco, and I wanted to go across the street where the car stopped, and he said, 'Oh, come on, I am dry;' and he went to the saloon and bought a bottle of beer for himself, and he give me a glass of beer; and he said one wasn't enough, and he took another bottle and give me a glass, and then we went out and stood on the corner, and he let the car pass; and he said, 'There goes the car;' and I said 'We better walk than standing here;' and he started off and left me standing there, and I followed him off until we got across the street. He was about five yards ahead of me, and I saw Mr. Stanwood there talking to two fellows, and Mr. Stanwood looked at me as though he was going to grab hold of me, and he didn't. And then we walked past the park and Mr. Schillig got into an automobile, and I stood on the hind axle and held on with one hand until we got into Yuba City, and he locked me up, and he went over and got my supper, and then he went to the post office and came back and asked me what they made out to-day; and I said that we were all going to be tried in one case; and he got mad at my attorneys and said he was going to slap them in the face if they came in there again. Q. Did he mention their names? A. Yes, sir; Royce and Downing, and started in cursing about a fellow named 'Burton'; and then he said to me, 'They haven't got any case against you, and what do you want to be tried with those fellows for;' and I said, 'I didn't think that they have any case against Ford; I didn't see him doing anything;' and that is practically all that was said."

The foregoing is substantially Suhr's entire testimony, except as to his personal history up to the time he came to Wheatland, which showed that he had a wife and children and had pursued farming and various other honorable occupations.

[10] A distinction exists, in legal contemplation, between admissions and confessions, as pointed out in People v. Miller, 122 Cal. 84, 87, 54 Pac. 523. In People v. Strong, 30 Cal. 151, it was said:

> "A confession, in criminal law, is the voluntary declaration made by a person who has committed a crime, or misdemeanor, to another, of the agency or participation he had in the same. * * * The word 'confessions' is not the mere equivalent of the words statements or declarations."

The term "confession" is restricted to acknowledgment of guilt. 1 Green. Ev. 170.

> "An admission of a fact, not in itself involving criminal intent, is not to be rejected as evidence (without the preliminary proof) merely because it may, when connected with other facts, tend to establish guilt." People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 632, 638.

See, also, People v. Le Roy, 65 Cal. 613, 4 Pac. 649.

It was held in People v. Knowlton, 122 Cal. 357, 55 Pac. 141, that declarations of the accused which are not confessions of guilt cannot be objected to as obtained under duress. People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 Pac. 15.

It is perhaps not necessary to make any distinction between the different statements of Suhr testified to, for in each instance full preliminary proof was made of their voluntary character.

[11] While the rule is that confessions are to be received with great caution (People v. Gelabert, 39 Cal. 664; 1 Green. Ev. § 200), Mr. Greenleaf says:

"When the admission is deliberately made and precisely identified, the evidence it affords is of the most satisfactory nature."

Speaking further on the subject, and after stating certain cautions to be observed, he says:

"Subject to these cautions, in receiving and weighing them it is generally agreed that deliberate confessions of guilt are among the most effectual proofs in the law. Their value depends on the supposition that they are deliberate and voluntary, and on the presumption that a rational being will not make admissions prejudicial to his interest and safety, unless when urged by the promptings of truth and conscience. Such confessions, so made by a prisoner, to any person, at any moment of time, and at any place, subsequent to the perpetration of the crime, and previous to his examination before the magistrate, are at common law received in evidence as among proofs of guilt." Id. § 215.

[12] Admissions and confessions of a defendant, which appear to have been voluntarily made, may properly be received in evidence (People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161; People v. Fredericks, 106 Cal. 554, 39 Pac. 944); they are substantial evidence of guilt (People v. Chrisman, 135 Cal. 282, 286, 67 Pac. 136); and it seems to be well settled that, where the corpus delicti is otherwise satisfactorily proven, a defendant may be convicted on his uncorroborated confession (Andrews v. People, 117 Ill. 201, 7 N. E. 265; Bartley v. Illinois, 156 Ill. 234, 40 N. E. 831; Wimberly v. State, 105 Ga. 188, 31 S. E. 162; Mitchell v. State, 45 Fla. 76, 33 South. 1009; Dugan v. Commonwealth, 102 Ky. 251, 43 S. W. 418; Sullivan v. State, 58 Neb. 799, 79 N. W. 721).

Where there is clear and positive proof of the corpus delicti, the court said, in Wimberly v. State, supra:

"It has been too often ruled, to be now gainsaid, that such proof of the corpus delicti may be considered as a circumstance sufficiently corroborating a confession."

Nor is it necessary that proof of the corpus delicti connect him with the commission of the crime to authorize proof of admissions. People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 57, 46 Pac. 896.

It may be conceded that Suhr's telegrams, sent on August 3d, early in the morning and in the afternoon of that day, go no further than to show his activities in the strike and boycott, and alone would not justify an inference of complicity in the conspiracy formed later in the day; and the same may be said of his connection with the meeting at which a collection was taken up. That he was, however, one of the prominent and influential spirits in keeping alive the feeling which finally culminated in a tragedy is fairly inferable from all the evidence, although we do not think that this alone would warrant an inference that he at any time prior to the 5 o'clock meeting contemplated forcible resistance to the officers or any open violation of law, as was the case with Ford. The proof of the commission of the crime was fully established, independently of any admissions or confessions of Suhr. These admissions and confessions, then, must be given whatever weight the law authorizes. There was in them sufficient to make him directly responsible for the death of Manwell, under the principles of law which we have applied to Ford's case, although he may not himself have killed Manwell. We cannot say that, on the face of these confessions, they appear to be unbelievable or inherently improbable. They were testified to by witnesses who stand unimpeached and whose official position would seem to carry with it some evidence of their character for truth and honesty. It may seem improbable that Suhr would have "given himself away" at a time when his counsel were preparing his defense, as is strongly urged. But is it less improbable that the witnesses to his confession committed perjury? However, the sole responsibility for accepting the testimony of these witnesses as true and making their own deductions from it was with the jury, and with its conclusions the Constitution of the state prevents our interfering.

5. Some alleged errors in giving and refusing instructions, not hereinbefore considered, and in rulings upon testimony offered, will be briefly noticed.

[13, 14] It is claimed that defendants' requested instruction numbered 3, upon the question of reasonable doubt, was that given in the case of Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 320, 52 Am. Dec. 711, and should have been given and was not in effect given by instruction 28. The criticism arises out of some expressions in the instruction given in addition to the form so often approved, and the safest to be used on the subject, as given by Chief Justice Shaw. For example, it reads in part:

The term "'reasonable doubt' [as referred to in these instructions] is a term often used, probably pretty well understood, but not easily defined," etc.

In its concluding paragraph the court said:

"A doubt that will justify an acquittal must not only be a reasonable one, but must arise from a candid and impartial examination of all the evidence in the case, or from a want of sufficient evidence on the part of the prosecution to convince you of the truth of the charge."

The suggestion to the jury that the term "reasonable doubt" is "pretty well understood, but not easily defined," was unnecessary, but harmless. The other criticized language, it is claimed, "eliminates the plain mandate of the law that the jury must be convinced, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the guilt of the accused." The jury were so plainly told that they could not convict unless the evidence convinced them beyond a reasonable doubt, and this admonition occurs so frequently in the instructions that we cannot believe there was prejudicial error in not repeating it at the end of this paragraph.

[15, 16] 6. The refusal to give defendants' instruction 21 was justified. It relates to the testimony of witnesses who may have had an interest in the result, and states:

> "You have a right to disregard entirely the testimony of any witness whom you believe to have willfully testified falsely."

The instruction fails to use the necessary qualifying words "in a material matter." Otherwise the instruction would be misleading and not a correct statement of the law. Besides, the court instructed the jury that "a witness willfully false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others."

7. The record is singularly free from alleged errors in rulings upon testimony admitted and refused. We feel justified in remarking that the learned trial judge showed a degree of patience and judicial equipoise and fairness not always found in hotly contested criminal trials lasting many days, as this did. But two assignments have been called to our attention, and these are of little importance. One of defendants' witnesses was asked, on cross-examination, if he had ever attended any of the meetings of the I. W. W., and defendants' objection was overruled. A witness for the defense was asked, on his direct examination, "Did you ever hear any threats made there at that meeting Saturday evening?" Objection was sustained. He was then asked, "What, if anything, did you hear at that meeting?" and answered fully. We discover no error in these rulings.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SUHR. (Cr. 254.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 10, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 9, 1914.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

H. D. Suhr was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Royce and Austin Lewis, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. It was stipulated that Crim. No. 253, People v. Ford, 143 Pac. 1075, and Crim. No. 254, People v. Suhr, should be tried together, and that the appeals in both cases should be heard on the record brought up in Crim. No. 253, People v. Ford. The law and the facts in both cases have been fully considered in People v. Ford, this day decided.

Upon the authority of that case, and for the reasons therein given, the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re BRADLEY'S ESTATE. (L. A. 3562.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 151*)—Parties Entitled to Appeal—Aggrieved Parties.

Where, on the hearing on the return of an administratrix showing a sale of real property, a higher bid than that for which the sale was made was presented, whereupon the court confirmed the sale of the real estate to this subsequent bidder, the order amounted in effect to a refusal to confirm the sale to the first bidder, and he was an aggrieved party, and entitled to appeal from the order of confirmation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 947–952; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 151*)—Parties Entitled to Appeal—Aggrieved Parties.

Where an order confirming a sale of land of an intestate also ordered a broker, with whom the land had been listed for sale, to pay to the administratrix money deposited with him by the successful bidder, the broker was entitled to appeal from the order of confirmation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 947–952; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

3. Executors and Administrators (§ 375*)—Sale of Real Estate—Confirmation or Vacation.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1552, providing, relative to the return by an executor or administrator, after making a sale of real estate, that if the proceedings were unfair, or the bid disproportionate to the value, and it appears that a sum exceeding such bid at least 10 per cent. exclusive of a new sale may be obtained, the court may vacate the sale and direct another to be had, and that if an offer of 10 per cent. more in amount be made to the court in writing, it is in the discretion of the court to accept such offer, and confirm the sale to such person, or order a new sale, to justify an order vacating the sale on the ground that a sum exceeding the bid by 10 per cent. may be obtained, it must also appear that the proceedings were unfair, or that the bid was disproportionate to the value, but where there is a written offer to the court of 10 per cent. more in amount, this is sufficient in itself to justify the court in confirming the sale to the higher bidder, or ordering a new sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1529–1538; Dec. Dig. § 375.*]

4. Executors and Administrators (§ 375*)—Sale of Real Estate—Conditional Bids.

Real estate of an intestate which the administratrix was authorized by the superior court to sell for cash at private sale, was listed for sale with a real estate broker, who obtained an offer of $5,500 from T., and who received from T. a deposit of $2,750. The broker informed the administratrix that he could get $4,500 for the place, and prepared and presented a bid for that amount, signed by H., who was an employé of the broker, accompanied by a deposit of $450. At the hearing on the return of the administratrix, T. expressed his willingness to pay $5,500, and signed a bid for that amount, providing that it was made on the assurance that the money paid the broker should be repaid, and that he should not be required to make any payment in excess of $2,750, until the $2,750 paid the broker was returned, whereupon the sale to him for $5,500 was confirmed; the order further directing the broker to pay $2,300 to the administratrix. The court found unfairness of proceedings and disproportion of price in connection with the sale to the broker, but did not expressly find that a higher price could be obtained. Held, that the court was not authorized to accept T.'s bid, as it was made on a condition which deprived it of the absolute character required by the order of sale and the nature of the transaction, and did not amount to a contract which T. could be compelled to complete as contemplated by the probate law, especially as the court had no power to order the broker to make the payment to the administratrix.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1529–1538; Dec. Dig. § 375.*]

5. Executors and Administrators (§ 375*)—Sale—Confirmation.

The court had no authority to order such payment by the broker to the administratrix, as this amounted to a judgment against the broker in a proceeding to which he was not made a party, and without any pleadings presenting the issues of his indebtedness to the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1529–1538; Dec. Dig. § 375.*]

6. Appeal and Error (§ 1176*)—Disposition of Cause—Remanding for Further Proceedings.

Upon a reversal of the order confirming the sale to T., the matter would be remanded for such further order as might seem just, instead of directing the court to confirm the sale to the broker, as though there was no finding that a price higher by 10 per cent. than the broker's bid could be obtained on a new sale, such a finding would have been warranted, and was doubtless omitted as immaterial, as it would have been had T.'s bid been in proper form.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4588–4596; Dec. Dig. § 1176.*]

7. Executors and Administrators (§ 375*)—Sale of Real Estate—Confirmation—Unfairness.

A real estate broker obtained the listing of real estate of an intestate with him for sale by one of the heirs, and obtained the approval of the administratrix of this action. He thereafter obtained an offer from T. of $5,500, and executed an earnest money receipt, describing himself as agent and the sale as subject to the approval of the owner. He then offered the administratrix, $4,500 for the property, and presented a bid of that amount in the name of one of his employés; the administratrix understanding that he had made a sale as agent for the estate for this price. Held, that there was such unfairness as justified the court in refusing to confirm the sale under Code Civ. Proc. § 1552, as a real estate agent, seeking the authorization of an owner to sell the property or the ratification of a sale already made without authority, is bound to disclose the price actually received or to be received, and has not the right, after making a sale, to represent the price to be smaller than it is, or to secretly purchase the property at a smaller price in order to make a profit on a resale, in view of Civ. Code, § 2228, providing that a trustee is bound to act in the highest good faith toward his beneficiary, and may not obtain any advantage by the slightest misrepresentation or concealment, and section 2322, providing that an agent is not authorized to do any act which a trustee is forbidden to do by article 2, c. 1, of the preceding title, which includes section 2228, and the broker occupied the position of agent for the estate.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Francis William Bradley, deceased. From an order confirming an administrator's sale of real estate, James W. Going and another appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Geo. B. Watson and Hamilton & Lindley, all of San Diego, for appellants. L. E. Dadmun and James E. Wadham, both of San Diego, and J. C. Tobin, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Upon the petition of Ida May Bradley, as administratrix of the estate of Francis William Bradley, deceased, the superior court of San Diego county, in which the administration of said estate was pending, made its order authorizing the administratrix to sell certain real property at private sale. On February 4, 1913, the administratrix made her return, showing a sale of the property to Hal G. Hotchkiss for $4,500, $450 of which had been deposited with her, and praying for confirmation of the sale. The return coming on for hearing, objection to the confirmation was made on behalf of some of the heirs, and, a bid in the sum of $5,500 being presented by J. C. Tobin, the court made its order confirming the sale of said real estate to Tobin for $5,500. The order further recited that James W. Going had in his possession the sum of $2,300 belonging to the estate and heirs of Francis William Bradley, deceased, and directed that Going pay said sum, within a stated time, to the executrix. From this order Going and Hotchkiss (who had made his bid at Going's request, and, it is claimed, on behalf of Going) appeal.

[1, 2] The order confirming the sale to Tobin was, in effect, a refusal to confirm the reported sale to Hotchkiss. The latter, therefore, is undoubtedly an aggrieved party, and he has the right to appeal. Estate of Leonis, 138 Cal. 194, 71 Pac. 171. See, also, In re Pearsons, 98 Cal. 603, 33 Pac. 451; Estate of West, 162 Cal. 352, 122 Pac. 953. And, whether or not Going has so connected himself with the Hotchkiss bid as to entitle him to appeal in his own name from the order refusing to confirm the sale to Hotchkiss, he is unquestionably a party aggrieved by the part of the order directing him to pay $2,300 to the administratrix. The respondents' position that the appellants are not interested, and are not entitled to appeal, cannot be sustained.

The evidence disclosed this state of facts. Going was a real estate agent. Hotchkiss was in his employ. In January, 1913, one of the heirs of the estate signed a paper authorizing Going to sell the property for $7,000, Going's commission to be anything received over $6,000. Going was informed that the land belonged to the Bradley estate. On the same day he obtained the oral approval of the administratrix to the "listing of the property with him" for sale. A few days later Going obtained from J. C. Tobin an offer of $5,500 for the property, Tobin paying $450 down, and afterwards depositing a further $2,300. A contract was signed by Going and Tobin. It was in the ordinary form of a deposit receipt signed by a real estate agent. By its terms Going, describing himself as agent, acknowledged the receipt from Tobin of $450 in part payment for the land, the entire purchase price being $5,500. Terms of sale, including time for perfecting title, were stated, and the sale was declared to be "subject to approval of owner." Following Going's signature, there appeared an agreement, signed by Tobin, to "purchase the above described property on the above described terms."

While these negotiations were being carried on, Going informed the administratrix that he could get $4,500 for the place, and, upon the suggestion of her attorney that a written bid be made, he prepared a bid in writing, offering $4,500 for the property, had Hotchkiss sign it, and presented it, with a check for $450 to the administratrix. Upon this bid the return of sale was made up and filed. Before the matter came up for hearing, Mr. Wadham, the attorney for the administratrix, learned that Tobin was to pay Going $5,500, and informed Going that he felt obliged to call that fact to the attention of the court. When the return came on for hearing, Mr. Wadham informed the court that Going was getting $5,500 for the property, and that Hotchkiss, the bidder, was acting for Going. The heirs other than the administratrix objected to the confirmation of the sale. Tobin was called, and expressed his willingness to pay $5,500 for the land. The hearing was then continued for one week. At the adjourned hearing, Going testified to the transactions between himself, Tobin, and Hotchkiss. He stated that the $4,500 bid had been made in behalf of Tobin. After this testimony had been given a written bid for $5,500, signed by Tobin, was presented and filed. This paper, addressed to the administratrix and the estate, contained the following:

> "This bid is made on the assurance that the money that I have heretofore paid Mr. James W. Going on account of said property shall be fully repaid to me, and I shall not be required to make any payment in excess of two thousand seven hundred fifty dollars ($2,750.00) until said two thousand seven hundred fifty ($2,750.00) so paid to James W. Going is returned to me."

Thereupon, there being no higher bid, the court confirmed the sale to Tobin. The court recited, in its order, the circumstances leading up to the Hotchkiss bid, that:

> "Said bid so signed by Hal G. Hotchkiss was unfair and disproportionate to the value of the property in this, That the said bid was not made bona fide by Hal G. Hotchkiss for and in his own behalf, but was made at the request of James W. Going, agent of said J. C. Tobin, * * * and that the sum of $450 so deposited, was * * * a portion of the money deposited by J. C. Tobin to be applied upon the purchase price of said property, and that said bid so signed by said Hal G. Hotchkiss was in * * * fact the bid made by said J. C. Tobin, and that said bid * * * was disproportionate to the value of the property in this, that it was $1,000 less than the actual amount already bid by J. C. Tobin for the said property, said J. C. Tobin having renewed his said bid of $5,500 in open court and in writing."

The order goes on to recite that there is in the possession of Going, as agent of the heirs and the estate, and as agent of Tobin, $2,300, paid by Tobin to Going to be paid to the administratrix and applied upon the purchase price of said property. After these recitals, and others relating to the adequacy of the price of $5,500, the order confirms the sale to Tobin for $5,500, and directs the administratrix to execute a deed to him upon payment of the balance of the purchase price, to wit, $5,050. It is further ordered that Going pay to the administratrix, on or before February 24, 1913, the sum of $2,300.

[3] The appellants take the position that the Hotchkiss bid of $4,500 was the only bid which the court was authorized to consider, and that the sale under that bid should have been confirmed. Section 1552 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "If the proceedings were unfair, or the sum bid disproportionate to the value, and if it appears that a sum exceeding such bid at least ten per cent. exclusive of a new sale may be obtained, the court may vacate the sale and direct another to be had."

To justify an order vacating the sale under this provision, it is not only necessary that it appear that a sum exceeding the bid by 10 per cent. may be obtained, but it must also appear that "the proceedings were unfair," or that the "sum bid was disproportionate to the value." Estate of Leonis, 138 Cal. 194, 71 Pac. 171; Estate of Robinson, 142 Cal. 152, 75 Pac. 777. It is argued that the requirement of unfairness or disproportion must also be met to authorize the court to accept an increased offer of 10 per cent. under the final sentence of section 1552. It is there provided that:

> "If an offer of ten per cent. more in amount than that named in the return be made to the court, in writing, by a responsible person, it is in the discretion of the court to accept such offer and confirm the sale to such person, or to order a new sale."

But no such condition is stated in this part of the statute, and we see no sufficient reason for reading it in. That the increased offer, to the amount stated, is all that is needed to justify the court in confirming the sale to the higher bidder or ordering a new sale was clearly intimated in Griffin v. Warner, 48 Cal. 383, where the court was considering a section of the Practice Act, substantially similar to section 1552 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the construction contended for by appellants was distinctly repudiated in Estate of Reed, 3 Cal. App. 144, 85 Pac. 155, a case which this court declined to rehear after judgment in the district court of appeal.

[4, 5] We think, however, that the appellants are right in their contention that the bid of Tobin was not one which the court was authorized to accept. The order of sale authorized the administratrix to sell for "cash, in gold coin of the United States, ten per cent. of the purchase price to be paid * * * at the time the bid therefor is accepted; the balance * * * to be paid upon confirmation of the sale." Tobin's offer declared upon its face that it was made upon the "assurance" that the money paid by him to Going should be refunded, and that one-half of the purchase price, or $2,750, was not to be paid until it had been returned to him. This was, in effect, a condition attached to the offer. Such condition deprived the offer of the absolute character which the terms of the order of sale, and the nature of the transaction, required. Tobin did not undertake to pay the entire purchase price, except upon an event which might or might not take place. The probate law contemplates a contract which the buyer may be compelled to complete. Tobin did not agree to enter into any such contract. It is true that the order of confirmation in the clause confirming the sale and directing a conveyance makes no reference to the condition embraced in the offer. But the order recites the offer, and rests upon it. The further provision, directing Going to pay $2,300 to the administratrix, serves to explain the failure to insert in the order the condition attached to Tobin's bid. It was probably expected that this payment would be made, and that Tobin would receive credit for it as a part payment of the purchase price. But, as will hereafter be pointed out, this part of the order cannot stand. Under these circumstances, it would manifestly be unjust to the purchaser to hold him to an absolute agreement, even though he is not here complaining of the form of the order. Furthermore, the appellant Hotchkiss, as the original bidder, has the clear right to object that the higher bid, which alone could authorize confirmation of the sale to another, was not made.

There is no legal foundation for the order requiring Going to pay $2,300 to the administratrix. This constituted a judgment against Going, and it was rendered in a proceeding to which he was not made a party, and without any pleadings presenting the issue of his indebtedness to the estate. That a valid judgment cannot be given under such circumstances is too elementary to require the citation of authority.

[6, 7] The order appealed from must, accordingly, be reversed. We do not, however, agree with the contention of the appellants that the court below should be directed to confirm the sale to Hotchkiss for $4,500. The refusal to confirm that sale was based on the ground that a written offer of 10 per cent. more had been made to the court—a ground which was, as we have seen, untenable. The sale could therefore have been vacated, under the first part of section 1552, only upon a showing that unfairness or disproportion of price concurred with the probability that a price, higher by 10 per cent. could be obtained on a new sale. While the order finds both unfairness of proceedings and disproportion of price, it does not find that the higher price could be obtained. We have no doubt, however, that the evidence would have warranted such a finding. The transaction between Going and Tobin, together with the latter's testimony at the trial, were sufficient in this regard. It is altogether probable that the court omitted any finding on the subject because, in view of the acceptance by it of Tobin's offer, the question was deemed immaterial, as in fact it would have been if Tobin's offer had been in proper form. Under these circumstances, we would not be justified in assuming that the court below actually concluded that 10 per cent. more could not be obtained on a new sale. The entire matter of the sale should be remanded for such further order as may seem just, in the light of what has been here said and of such additional facts as may be presented. As an aid in the further proceedings which are to follow, it may be well to notice the claim of the appellants that the evidence fails to support the findings of unfairness and disproportion of value. We may concede, for the purposes of this discussion, that the evidence was not such as to justify the finding that the sum bid by Hotchkiss was disproportionate to the value of the property. There is no need to go into this, as direct evidence on the point, one way or the other, may readily be supplied at another hearing. The court was, however, we think, fully warranted in concluding and finding that the proceedings leading up to the sale to Hotchkiss had been unfair. Hotchkiss was acting under the direction and in the interest of Going, and is affected by any circumstances affecting Going's status in the transaction. The appellants complain of the recitals that Going acted as agent for the heirs and estate of Bradley, as well as for Tobin. Whatever may have been his relationship to Tobin, he was properly regarded as occupying the position of agent for the estate and those interested in it. He had sought and obtained the "listing" of the property by one of the heirs, and had had this action approved by the administratrix. He had thereafter taken a deposit from Tobin on a sale to the latter for $5,500, describing himself in the contract and receipt as agent, and making the sale subject to the approval of the owner. Thereupon he had notified the administratrix that he could get $4,500 for the property. In communicating with the administratrix, he impliedly requested her to ratify a sale which he, as agent for the estate or the heirs, had made, or to authorize him to make a sale. That this was the administratrix's understanding of the situation is shown by the return, in which she states that the bid of Hotchkiss was "made through the real estate firm of James W. Going," and that a commission would be due to Going. No commission had in fact been agreed upon. Going was attempting to secure, as his compensation, the difference between the $5,500 offered by Tobin, and the $4,500 named in the Hotchkiss bid. We do not suggest that there would have been any impropriety in this effort, if the facts had been made known to the parties in interest. But certainly a real estate agent, seeking the authorization of an owner to sell property, or the ratification of a sale already made without authority, is bound to disclose the price actually received or to be received by him on a sale. He has not the right, after making a sale for a given price, to represent that price to be smaller than it is, or to secretly purchase the property himself at a smaller price, in order to make the profit of a resale at the price which he might and should have secured for his principal. The latter course of dealing, which is the one pursued by Going in this case, is in violation of the fundamental rule prohibiting an agent or trustee, in matters connected with the agency or trust, from obtaining any advantage therein over his principal or beneficiary by the slightest misrepresentation * * * or concealment." Civ. Code, §§ 2322, 2228; Calmon v. Sarraille, 142 Cal. 638, 76 Pac. 486. A sale, induced by such proceedings, is tainted with "unfairness" within the meaning of sections 1552 and 1554 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The order is reversed, with directions to the court below to take further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

ROYAL TRUST CO. v. MacBEAN et al.

1. Limitation of Actions (§ 2*)—Actions to Recover on Depositor's Liability—What Law Governs.

The limitation statutes of the place where an action is brought to recover on the double liability of a shareholder of an insolvent bank, govern.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 4–8; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

2. Limitation of Actions (§ 34*)—Statutes —Applicability.

The three-year limitation prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 359, on actions to enforce liabilities created by law, applies to an action to enforce the liability of the shareholders in a Canadian bank under the bank act of that dominion, providing that stockholders in a bank shall be liable for an amount equal to the par value of their shares over and above any unpaid balance due on their subscriptions, such liability being one imposed by law in contradistinction to the contractual liability to pay the full amount of the subscription price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 151–157; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. Limitation of Actions (§ 34*)—Construction—Statutes.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 359, providing a three-year limitation upon actions to enforce liabilities created by law, an action against a stockholder in an insolvent bank to recover an additional amount equal to the par value of his shares is barred at the expiration of three years from the time when the liability was created.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 151–157; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

4. Limitation of Actions (§ 58*)—Accrual of Right of Action.

Under Bank Act of Canada, declaring that the shareholders in an insolvent bank shall be liable for an amount equal to the par value of their shares over and above any unpaid balance due on their subscriptions in the event the property of the bank is insufficient to pay its debts, and the Winding Up Act, declaring that the amount which shareholders are liable to contribute shall be deemed an asset of the bank and a debt due to be paid as directed, and in view of act of 1906, expressly declaring that shareholders shall be considered indebted from the time their liability commences, but that the debt shall be payable when calls are made, the right of action to recover upon the liability of a shareholder in an insolvent Canadian bank accrues upon insolvency, and hence the three-year limitation prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 359, begins to run from that date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 324–328, 346, 347; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

5. Limitation of Actions (§ 58*)—Running of Limitations—Statutes—Construction.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 359, prescribing a three-year limitation to enforce the liability created by law, or to recover a penalty or forfeiture imposed, and providing that such actions must be brought within three years after discovery of the facts upon which the penalty or forfeiture attached, or the liability was created, the fact that it could not immediately, upon the insolvency of a foreign bank, be determined what part of the shareholder's double liability should be enforced does not toll the running of limitations.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by the Royal Trust Company, as liquidator of the Ontario Bank, against Isabella MacBean and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. White Mortimer and H. A. Massey, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Wm. Chambers, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered in favor of defendants upon the sustaining of their demurrer to the second amended complaint.

The action was brought to enforce the liability of the defendants, under the laws of the Dominion of Canada, as stockholders of an insolvent bank which had been incorporated under the laws of said dominion. The complaint sets forth very fully the statutory provisions governing the incorporation of banks, the liability of stockholders, and the procedure in cases of insolvency or bankruptcy.

It appears that by the Bank Act of Canada, enacted in 1890, it is provided that:

> "In the event of the property and assets of the bank being insufficient to pay its debts and liabilities, each shareholder of the bank shall be liable for the deficiency to an amount equal to the par value of the shares held by him, in addition to any amount not paid up on such shares."

In the event that no proceedings are taken under any act for winding up the bank, the directors, if suspension of payment continues for three months after the insolvency of the bank (as defined in the act), are required to make calls on the shareholders to the amount deemed by them necessary to pay the liabilities of the bank. In case of winding up, calls are governed by the terms of the Winding Up Act. These provisions, which were in force when the defendants became owners of shares in the Ontario Bank, were re-enacted in the Bank Act of 1906, in effect at the commencement of this action.

There was a "Winding Up Act" in force when the defendants became stockholders. It, too, was superseded by an act of 1906. The two acts are substantially the same, so far as the provisions affecting this action are concerned. They define insolvency, provide for application to the court by creditors for a winding up order, authorize the court to appoint a liquidator (or more than one), who shall take the property of the company, and have power, with the approval of the court, to bring or defend actions, to carry on the business, and do other acts so far as necessary to the beneficial winding up of the business. Provision is made for the settlement, by the court, of a list of contributories. Every shareholder, it is declared, shall be liable to contribute the amount unpaid on his shares, or on his liability to the company, or to its members or creditors under the act or charter of incorporation; "and the amount which he is liable to contribute shall be deemed an asset of the company, and a debt due to the company, payable as directed or appointed under this act." Section 46 of the earlier act, and section 53 of the later, provide that:

> "The liability of any person to contribute to the assets of a company under this act, in the event of the business of the same being wound up, shall create a debt accruing due from such person at the time when his liability commenced, but payable at the respective times when calls are made, as hereinafter provided, for enforcing such liability."

The court is empowered, at any time after making a winding up order, and either before or after it has ascertained the sufficiency of the assets of the company, to "make calls on and order payment thereof by all or any of the contributories * * * to the extent of their liability, for payment of all or any sums it deems necessary to satisfy the debts and liabilities of the company, and the costs * * * of winding up. * * *" The court is also empowered, after making a winding up order, to make an order of reference, referring and delegating its powers to an officer of the court.

In addition to setting forth these provisions of the Canadian laws, the complaint alleges the corporate capacity of the plaintiff and of the Ontario Bank, and alleges that since March, 1898, the defendants have been the owners of 34 shares of the capital stock of said bank. On October 13, 1906, the Ontario Bank suspended payment, and, under the law of Canada, it became insolvent 90 days thereafter. On September 29, 1908, the high court of justice for the province of Ontario made its order declaring the Ontario Bank to be insolvent, and ordering that its business be wound up. On the same day said court appointed the plaintiff, the Royal Trust Company, liquidator of said bank, and delegated to George Kappele, official referee, "all such powers as are conferred upon the court by the Winding Up Act and as may be necessary for the winding up of the said bank." Thereafter a list of contributories was duly settled, the defendants appearing on said list as owners of 34 shares, and the amount of their liability being stated as $3,400. On November 1, 1910, the official referee made a call upon each of the contributories for 95 per cent. of the amount for which they were respectively settled upon the list, and such contributories were ordered to make payment to the plaintiff, as liquidator, on or before December 1, 1910. Notice of this order was served on defendants, but they declined to pay. In January, 1911, a second order, requiring defendants to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $3,230 (being 95 per cent. of the amount of their liability), together with $15 costs, was made, and a copy of this order was served on defendants. The amount remaining unpaid, this action was instituted to recover $3,245.

[1, 2] The demurrer specifies various grounds. One of these is that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Whatever may be the merit of other specifications, we think the demurrer was rightly sustained on this ground. The second amended complaint was filed on February 13, 1912. The record does not show the date of filing of the original complaint. The appellant states, in one of its briefs, that this pleading was filed on June 22, 1911. This may, for the purposes of the present discussion, be accepted as a correct statement of the date of the commencement of the action.

Since the action was brought in this state, it is, of course, governed by the limitation statutes of California. Glenn v. Saxton, 68 Cal. 353, 9 Pac. 420; Miller v. Lane, 160 Cal. 90, 116 Pac. 58; Platt v. Wilmot, 193 U. S. 602, 24 Sup. Ct. 542, 48 L. Ed. 809.

The obligation which the complaint seeks to enforce is the liability of shareholders under the Bank Act of Canada, for an amount equal to the par value of their shares, over and above the unpaid balance due on the subscription for the shares. This is a "liability created by law," and an action to enforce it is accordingly subject to the limitation declared in section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It has been settled by repeated decisions of this court that the section in question is applicable to actions brought to enforce the liability of stockholders, under the Constitution and statutes of California (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322) for a proportionate part of the indebtedness of the corporation. Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87; Bank of S. L. O. v. Pac. Coast S. S. Co., 103 Cal. 594, 37 Pac. 499; Wells v. Black, 117 Cal. 157, 48 Pac. 1090, 37 L. R. A. 619, 59 Am. St. Rep. 162; Santa Rosa Nat. Bank v. Barnett, 125 Cal. 410, 58 Pac. 85; Jones v. Goldtree Bros. Co., 142 Cal. 383, 77 Pac. 939; Gardiner v. Royer, 167 Cal. 238, 139 Pac. 75. On the other hand, an action to compel the stockholder to respond to a call for the unpaid balance of his subscription is founded upon a contract, and, unless such contract is in writing, and executed within this state, is governed by subdivision 1 of section 332 of the Civil Code. Glenn v. Saxton, 68 Cal. 353, 9 Pac. 420. See Union Sav. Bank v. Leiter, 145 Cal. 696, 79 Pac. 441. We can see no real distinction, so far as the question of limitation is concerned, between the liability of a stockholder in a California corporation for such proportion of the corporate debts as the amount of stock owned by him bears to the whole subscribed capital stock and the liability of a shareholder in a Canadian bank for "an amount equal to the par value of the shares held by him" (in addition to any amount not paid up). Each is a liability declared by statute, and each is a liability differing from and superimposed upon the contractual obligation to pay the par value of shares subscribed for. It is no doubt true that one who voluntarily subscribes for or purchases shares of stock does, in a sense, contract to become liable in accordance with the statute governing the incorporation. But so, too, is the proportionate liability of stockholders in California corporations on corporate contracts a contractual liability for certain purposes, as, for example, to authorize an attachment in an action against the stockholder. Kennedy v. Cal. Sav. Bank, 97 Cal. 93, 31 Pac. 846, 33 Am. St. Rep. 163. The liability is nevertheless one created by law, within the meaning of the statute of limitations. In Platt v. Wilmot, 193 U. S.

602, 24 Sup. Ct. 542, 48 L. Ed. 809, the court had under consideration a New York statute (section 394, Code Civ. Proc.) applying a three-year limitation to "an action against a * * * stockholder of a moneyed corporation, * * * to enforce a liability created by the common law or by statute." By section 382 of the same Code, an action upon a contract obligation or liability was barred in six years. The action was brought in New York against a holder of stock in a Kansas corporation, organized under laws making stockholders individually liable for "an additional amount equal to the stock owned by each stockholder"—a provision, it will be observed, very similar to that found in the Canadian Bank Act. It was held that the action was governed by section 394. The court declared that, although the liability was of a contractual nature, in that the stockholder, in subscribing for or purchasing his stock, entered into a contract authorized by statute, yet the liability was created by statute within the meaning of section 394, "as it was by virtue of the statute that the contractual liability arose." The decision, which is directly in point, strongly reinforces the view that section 359 of our Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to the action before us. Miller v. Lane, 160 Cal. 90, 116 Pac. 58, does not conflict with this conclusion. Indeed, it is in harmony with what we have here said. The opinion in the Miller Case contains one or two expressions from which the appellant seeks to argue that where the claim sued upon constitutes "corporate assets," the action is not governed by section 359. But the case did not involve this question, and it cannot be said to have decided it. Whether section 359 or some other part of the statute of limitations applies to an action against a stockholder must, under the provisions of our Code, depend upon whether the liability is one "created by law," not upon whether it is "assets of the corporation."

[3] Taking it, then, that section 359 is the statutory provision applying to the case, there arises the further question, When did the statute begin to run. It must be taken as definitely settled in this state that, under the peculiar language of section 359, an action against a stockholder on a liability created by law (e. g., the proportionate liability of stockholders of California corporations) is barred at the expiration of three years from the time when the liability was created. Hunt v. Ward, supra; Gardiner v. Royer, supra, and cases cited. This is, of course, a marked exception to the general rule, which measures the period of limitation from the accrual of the cause of action.

[4] It seems entirely clear that, under the provisions of the Canadian statutes set forth in the complaint, the liability of stockholders to pay an amount equal to the par value of their shares was "created" at least as early as the insolvency of the corporation. Under the Bank Act, shareholders are declared subject to this liability "in the event of the property * * * of the bank being insufficient to pay its debts." The Winding Up Act, after setting forth the procedure in insolvency, declares the liability of shareholders to contribute as provided in the charter or act of incorporation, and the amount which the shareholder is liable to contribute (i. e., in this case, an amount equal to the par value of the shares) is "deemed an asset of the company, and a debt due to the company, payable as directed or appointed under this act." Other provisions of the act lay down various methods of making calls on account of such liability. The language last quoted, however, indicates very clearly the intent of the lawmakers to distinguish between the time when the liability originates as an existing obligation and the time when it becomes payable. The liability is deemed a debt due to the company, although it is not payable until there has been a call pursuant to the terms of the law. Any possible doubt on this score is removed by the later section (46 of the prior and 53 of the subsequent act), to the effect that the liability to contribute, in the event of the business being wound up, "shall create a debt accruing due from such person at the time when his liability commenced, but payable at the respective times when calls are made. * * * " The liability came into being, then, or was created, before any calls were made. It "accrued due," in the language of the act, when the liability commenced. And the commencement of the liability must be taken to be the time when, under the act of incorporation (the bank act) such liability is declared to arise, i. e., in the event of the inability of the corporation to pay its debts. The bank suspended payment in October, 1906. Under the law, it became insolvent 90 days thereafter. The liability was created, at the latest, upon the beginning of the status of insolvency, and the three year period of limitation began to run then. It may be that no action could be brought in advance of a call, and that the action became barred before the occurrence of the event upon which the right to institute suit depended. But this result, anomalous as it seems, necessarily follows from the language of section 359, construed as that section has uniformly been construed by this court.

will not bear the construction thus sought to be put upon it. The actions therein referred to "must be brought within three years after the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts upon which the penalty or forfeiture attached, or the liability was created." The fair reading of this section makes the discovery the starting point of the period of limitation only in cases of actions to recover a penalty or forfeiture. In actions to enforce a "liability created by law," the period is three years from the creation of the liability. It is true that in Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 171, 15 Pac. 670, the court assumed that the discovery of the facts started the period of limitation in an action on stockholders' liability. The point was not, however, material to the decision. In later cases, the court seems to have taken it for granted that the section required an action like the one before us to be begun "within three years after the liability was created." Hunt v. Ward, supra; Wells v. Black, supra; Gardiner v. Royer, supra. In none of the later decisions on the subject is there any suggestion that the discovery of the facts by the plaintiff has any bearing on the question of limitation. But, even if this view be wrong, the plaintiff has not pleaded a belated discovery of the "facts upon which the liability was created." The facts which it avers were not known until within three years had to do merely with the amount of the liability which it would be necessary to call. This may have affected the accrual of a cause of action, but it did not, as has been pointed out heretofore, touch the creation of the liability. The liability of the defendants as shareholders was created when the bank became insolvent. It is not alleged that the fact of insolvency was not known to plaintiff when it occurred.

Holding these views on the question of limitation, we find it unnecessary to consider any other ground specified in the demurrer.

In re SHIPP'S ESTATE. (L. A. 3755.)

BASTARDS (§ 1*)—ISSUE OF INVALID MARRIAGE —"LEGITIMATE CHILD."

Under Civ. Code, § 1387, providing that the issue of all marriages null in law or dissolved by divorce are legitimate, the child of parents who celebrated a ceremonial marriage, though no license was procured, as required by Civ. Code, § 55, must be considered legitimate and entitled to inherit; the mother at least believing that the marriage was solemnized as required by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. §§ 1–3; Dec. Dig. § 1.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Legitimate Child.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Louis Shipp, deceased. From decree of distribution in favor of Harry Shipp and Donald Shipp, a minor, the former appeals. Affirmed.

Shepard & Alm and Arvid G. Alm, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. F. McCulloch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The court below entered its decree distributing the estate of Louis Shipp in equal shares to Harry Shipp and to Donald Shipp, a minor. Harry Shipp appeals.

The only question is whether Donald Shipp was entitled to share in the estate. Harry Shipp, the appellant, was the son of Louis Shipp by a marriage which had been dissolved by divorce prior to 1909. He was, beyond any question, an heir of the decedent. Donald Shipp was born March 1, 1911, the offspring of a union between Louis Shipp and Ora McCoy. There was evidence which amply warranted the trial court in believing that in January, 1909, a ceremony of marriage between Louis Shipp and Ora McCoy, thereafter known as Ora Shipp, had been solemnized by a priest; that the solemnization was regular in every respect save for the want of a license; that Ora McCoy believed that a license had been duly issued; and that she entered into marital relations with Shipp in good faith, believing that she was his wife. The child was recognized by Louis Shipp as his son. Counsel for Donald Shipp stipulated at the hearing that there was no record of any license in the county of Los Angeles, where the ceremony was performed, nor any record of any marriage, and admitted that "the purported marriage was a void or null marriage." Perhaps, in thus admitting the invalidity of the marriage, he conceded too much. No doubt solemnization is, since the amendment of 1895 to section 55 of the Civil Code, essential to a valid marriage in this state. Whether, however, the failure to secure a license will nullify a marriage otherwise legally solemnized is a question that may be debatable (Bish. Mar., Div. & Sep. § 426), and that has been left open by this court. Norman v. Norman, 121 Cal. 621, 629, 54 Pac. 143, 42 L. R. A. 343, 66 Am. St. Rep. 74. But granting, as has been said, the invalidity of the marriage, the respondent contends that the child is entitled to inherit as legitimate by virtue of the last clause of section 1387 of the Civil Code, providing that "the issue of all marriages null in law, or dissolved by divorce, are legitimate." The appellant seeks to give to this clause a very limited interpretation; his contention being that the term "marriages null in law," as here used, includes only the marriages which are subject to an action for annulment on one of the grounds specified in section 82 of the Civil Code. We think the provision should not be construed so narrowly. The statute was passed with the generous and kindly purpose of relieving children, to some extent, from the harsh consequences of illegitimacy—a status for which the children affected are in no degree morally responsible. The section should be liberally construed. Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 582, 31 Pac. 915, 19 L. R. A. 40.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

There may be some question whether the enactment applies to the offspring of marriages which are declared by the Code to be "illegal and void," or "void from the beginning," such as incestuous marriages (section 59), marriages of whites with negroes (section 60), or (under certain conditions) marriages between persons one of whom is already married (section 61). This question was very fully argued in Estate of Baldwin, but the court, in deciding the case (162 Cal. 471, 123 Pac. 267), did not find it necessary to express any opinion on the point. See, however, Graham v. Bennet, 2 Cal. 503. Be this as it may, we are satisfied that section 1387 should be held to apply to an attempted marriage, contracted in good faith, so far, at least, as one of the parties is concerned, where there is a concurrence of the elements of marriage, as defined in section 55 of the Civil Code; that is to say, where there has been the consent of parties capable of making a contract of marriage, followed by a solemnization authorized by the Code. Such is the situation here. The parties were capable of entering into the marriage relation. They consented to do so, and to their consent was added a solemnization by a person authorized. If such marriage was vitiated by the want of a license, it was nevertheless within the beneficent scope of section 1387, and the child resulting from it should be saved the stigma and loss resulting from bastardy.

The respondent makes the further claim that the child was legitimated by adoption, in accordance with the provisions of section 230 of the Civil Code. Our conclusion on the question already discussed makes it unnecessary to consider the soundness of this position.

The judgment is affirmed.

HYNES v. M. J. & M. M. CONSOLIDATED et al. (L. A. 3273.)

1. Limitation of Actions (§ 39*)—Suit to Vacate Judgment—Accrual of Right of Action.

Where judgment was rendered in favor of the state canceling a certificate of purchase of school land December 27, 1892, after which the state issued to a subsequent purchaser a certificate of purchase for the same land, a right of action then accrued in favor of those holding under the original certificate to sue to set aside the previous judgment, and, such action not having been instituted until July, 1911, it was barred by the four-year statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 343), regardless of the fact that the original judgment was in favor of the state.

2. Judgment (§ 456*)—Vacation—Laches.

The state having issued a certificate for the purchase of certain school lands to D. on payment of 20 per cent. of the price March 20, 1889, and he having made no further payments, a judgment was recovered canceling his certificate December 27, 1892. The state again sold the land to B. July 27, 1899, and no claim was made to the land by those claiming under D. until the year 1900, after those claiming under B. had expended large sums of money and discovered oil on the land. Held, that D.'s successors in interest were then barred by laches from maintaining a suit to set aside the judgment canceling the original certificate.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by M. J. Hynes, administrator of the estate of Charles H. Gilman, deceased, against M. J. & M. M. Consolidated. From a judgment for defendants and against cross-complainants J. B. Treadwell and Fred W. Lake, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Cullinan & Hickey, of San Francisco, James F. Peck, of Oakland, and Walter Shelton, Chas. C. Boynton, and Frank M. Hultman, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Frank H. Short, of Fresno, Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, J. W. McKinley and Hunsaker & Britt, all of Los Angeles, and Thomas Scott, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The object of the action of the plaintiff was to declare that certain of the defendants were trustees holding, as such, the title to section 36, township 12 north, range 24 west, in Kern county, for the use and benefit of the heirs of Charles H. Gilman, deceased, for a conveyance thereof by or for said defendants to said heirs, and, further, that a certain judgment rendered against one S. Davis, under whom said heirs claim, in favor of the people of the state of California, on December 27, 1892, be set aside. The judgment referred to is the same judgment that was under consideration by this court in People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 673, 77 Pac. 651, Lake v. Bonynge, 161 Cal. 120, 118 Pac. 535, and Lake v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 182, 131 Pac. 371. J. B. Treadwell and Fred W. Lake were made defendants, and it was said that they had or claimed some interest in the premises. They appeared and filed a cross-complaint against the other defendants, alleging that they were interested with said Gilman in his lifetime in said section of land, and asking practically the same relief against the other defendants as that asked by the plaintiff Hynes on behalf of the Gilman heirs. To this complaint and cross-complaint the other defendants filed demurrers. The court sustained these demurrers without leave to amend, and thereupon entered judgment against the plaintiff on his complaint and against Treadwell and Lake on their cross-complaint, declaring that they should take nothing by their respective actions. From this judgment the plaintiff and said cross-complainants appeal.

The land above described was one of the school sections belonging to the state. The aforesaid S. Davis applied to purchase the same from the state, and on March 20, 1889, he having paid the sum of $160 and interest to that date on the purchase price, leaving $640 of the principal unpaid, the register of the state land office issued to him a certificate of purchase therefor. The effect of the aforesaid judgment of December 27, 1892, was to declare that said certificate was null and void and to terminate all right, interest, and estate of Davis in and to the land.

In People v. Davis, supra, it was decided by this court that the aforesaid judgment was not void on the face of the record, and that it could not be vacated or annulled by the court on motion in the case on the ground that it was a judgment which on its face did not show jurisdiction, but that the only remedy of any party deeming himself aggrieved thereby was by a separate suit in equity to set it aside. This view of that judgment has since been affirmed by this court in Lake v. Bonynge, supra, and Lake v. Superior Court, supra. The present action by the plaintiff and the cross-complainants purports to be a suit in equity begun in pursuance of the declaration made in People v. Davis, supra.

It appears from the allegations that on April 1, 1890, Davis transferred his interest in the land to said Charles H. Gilman; that Gilman, on December 7, 1900, transferred a half interest therein to Lake and a one-fourth interest to one H. H. Snow, and that Snow, on April 14, 1910, transferred his said one-fourth interest to J. B. Treadwell, one of the cross-complainants herein. Mary A. Bonynge applied to purchase the land from the state on July 22, 1899, and on January 23, 1900, having paid the portion of the purchase money necessary for that purpose, she obtained from the state register a certificate of purchase therefor. Her right to purchase the land was contested. The case was certified to the court for determination, and the court decided and decreed that she was entitled to purchase. This judgment was rendered on May 19, 1908, and the same was affirmed on appeal by this court on February 7, 1910. See Moran v. Bonynge, 157 Cal. 295, 107 Pac. 312. The defendants other than Treadwell and Lake and one Carpenter, who claims as assignee of one of the heirs of Gilman, but who refused to join as plaintiff, all claim under the Bonynge purchase.

[1] It is assigned as cause of demurrer by the respondents that neither the complaint nor the cross-complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the actions stated therein are each barred by the statute of limitations and by laches. We think the point that the actions are barred by the statute of limitations is well taken. The judgment sought to be set aside, as we have said, was rendered on December 27, 1892. This action was begun by the filing of the complaint on July 21, 1911. The limitation provided by the Code for an action in equity to vacate a judgment is four years, at the utmost. Code Civ. Proc. § 343. The appellants claim that this statute does not apply in the present case because the judgment was in favor of the state and there is no statute providing that such actions may be maintained against the state. Conceding, for the purposes of the case that this is true, so far as the state itself is concerned, it does not follow that the actions are not barred. These actions are not against the state, but against the respondents claiming under the certificate of purchase issued by the state to Bonynge on July 22, 1899. The statute provides when an application to purchase school land is approved and the first payment of the purchase money is made, such certificate of purchase shall be issued to the purchaser, "which certificate is prima facie evidence of title." Pol. Code, § 3514. Ever since the 22d of July, 1899, therefore, the said Mary A. Bonynge, and those claiming under her, have been holding under a certificate from the state purporting to transfer to them all the right, title, and interest of the state in said land. After that date there was no legal obstacle to an action against them to declare that the previous judgment in People v. Davis, purporting to annul the certificate of 1889, on which the appellants relied, was invalid because of the lack of due service of process. From and after the date of the Bonynge certificate, if not before, such action could have been begun against these parties. The period of limitation for such action, fixed by section 343, began to run at that time, and it expired eight years before this action was begun.

[2] The equitable rule that stale demands will not be recognized and enforced in equity, commonly called the doctrine of laches, is also a sufficient bar in this case. Davis paid 20 per cent. of the purchase price and obtained his certificate of purchase on March 20, 1889. This certificate recited that further payments of 7 per cent. interest in advance on the balance of the purchase were due annually thereafter. No such payment ever was made by Davis or any other person. No attention whatever did he or those claiming under him pay to the completion of that purchase until, in the year 1900, 11 years having passed, the persons holding under the Bonynge purchase discovered oil in the land, and it thereby became extremely valuable. It is not asserted that either Davis or his successors ever took possession of or occupied the land, or made any improvements thereon. After this discovery of oil had demonstrated the value of the land, the successors of Davis attempted to complete his purchase and tendered to the county treasurer the amount that would then have been due thereon. It is quite clear that before that discovery they did not intend to complete the purchase and did not want the land. It is not alleged in terms, but it is obvious from the facts appearing in the record, that the Bonynge parties expended large sums of money in making that discovery. They have since that time extracted large quantities of oil therefrom, and a number of transfers of the property have been made, while the appellants made no direct attack upon said judgment. They do not plead ignorance, but on the contrary, they show that in the year 1900 they then became aware of all the facts they now aver. No sufficient excuse for the delay is alleged.

With respect to Lake and Treadwell, it may be further observed that they are concluded by the judgment in the case of Lake v. Bonynge, above cited. The judgment is recited in the complaint and also in the cross-complaint. It was held in Lake v. Superior Court, supra, that the judgment in Lake v. Bonynge was conclusive upon the parties thereto and to those claiming under them by subsequent purchases, and that it forever determined that the original judgment in People v. Davis was valid as against them; also that Treadwell, as a successor of Snow, was bound thereby.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Replevin (§ 93*)—Finding—Judgment.

In an action for claim and delivery for the possession or value of certain books, based on the theory of defendant's conversion, a finding that defendant was not guilty of the conversion was a finding upon the paramount issue, which in itself disposed of the case upon its merits and supported an ultimate judgment for defendant.

3. Replevin (§ 93*)—Finding—Effect.

In view of a finding in claim and delivery that defendant was not guilty of a conversion, the finding as to value and the conclusion of law that plaintiff was without legal capacity to sue in the state, because it had not complied with Civ. Code, §§ 405, 408, 410, requiring a foreign corporation to file with the secretary of a state a certified copy of its articles and a designation of some person to receive process, were immaterial and would be ignored.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by International Text-Book Company against Harold C. Holmes. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lew B. Douglass and Alexander & O'Donnell, all of San Francisco, for appellant. H. U. Brandenstein, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The plaintiff in this action is a foreign corporation doing business in this state. The business of the plaintiff is that of teaching students by the correspondence method. The appeal was prepared and perfected under the new or alternative method from a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant in an action of claim and delivery wherein the plaintiff sought to recover the possession or the value of a certain lot of books. The books in controversy were delivered to various students of the plaintiff in the state of California, under the terms and conditions of a written contract. Subsequently the books were found in the possession of the defendant. The plaintiff's complaint proceeded upon the theory that the possession of the books in question by the students was the plaintiff's possession, and alleged that the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully took the books from the possession of the plaintiff and refused to return the same upon demand. The answer of the defendant denied the tort and pleaded in abatement the plaintiff's noncompliance with the provisions of the Civil Code which require that before a foreign corporation may maintain a suit or action in any of the courts of this state, it must file with the secretary of state a certified copy of its articles of incorporation and a designation of a person upon whom process may be served. Civ. Code, §§ 405, 408, 410.

The judgment roll is accompanied by a special and limited transcription of the evidence taken upon the trial, that is to say, the transcript purports to show only so much of the evidence received upon the trial as relates to and bears upon two findings of the court below, namely, the finding sustaining the defendant's plea in abatement and the finding declaring that the property in suit had no value beyond its market value. But two points are made in support of the appeal, and they are: (1) That the finding of value is contrary to the evidence; and (2) that the lower court erred in its conclusion of law that the plaintiff had no legal capacity to sue in this state because of the undisputed fact that it had failed to comply with the provisions of section 405 et seq. of the Civil Code.

[1] The condition of the record before us renders the two points stated unavailing to the plaintiff. In the first place, it is doubtful if the record shows any evidence to the effect that the books in question had a special value. In any event, the evidence upon that phase of the case is in substantial conflict and for this reason, if for no other, the finding must stand.

[2, 3] But, aside from these considerations the record shows a further finding to the effect that the defendant was not guilty of the conversion charged. The latter finding is not assailed. Obviously the latter finding presents the paramount issue in the case; that is to say, it is a finding upon an issue which in itself disposes of the case upon its merits, and, having been made in favor of the defendant, the further finding as to the value of the property in suit was immaterial and unnecessary. Rosewarn v. Washington Gold Mining Co., 84 Cal. 219, 23 Pac. 1035. The paramount finding in the case is sufficient to support the ultimate judgment rendered in favor of the defendant; and therefore the conclusion of law that the plaintiff had not the right to maintain the action may be ignored. Spencer v. Duncan, 107 Cal. 423, 40 Pac. 549; Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 103 Pac. 889.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

DAVIDSON v. GRAHAM. (Civ. 1262.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 21, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 20, 1914.)

2. Judgment (§ 106*)—Default Judgment—"Answer."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, providing that in an action on contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if no answer has been filed within the time specified in the summons or such further time as may have been granted, the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the defendant's default, and immediately enter judgment for the amount demanded, a general demurrer, and a demurrer also to the jurisdiction of the court filed by defendant in an action on a bond, constituted an "answer," saving defendant from a default.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Answer.]

3. Appearance (§ 8*)—Demurrer—Statute.

Filing by defendants of demurrers constitutes an appearance within Code Civ. Proc. § 1014, providing that a defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives plaintiff written notice of his appearance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 23–41; Dec. Dig. § 8.*

4. Judgment (§ 107*)—Demurrer—Disposition.

It is irregular to enter a judgment against a defendant, in whose behalf a demurrer has been filed, without disposing of the demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 198–200; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

5. Mandamus (§ 10*)—Entry of Default—Stipulation.

The clerk of the superior court having a stipulation that no default should be taken against the defendant waiving his demurrer, without express limit as to time, in the filing of which plaintiff treated the defendant as having appeared, and there being a doubt as to the plaintiff's right to such entry, mandamus would not lie to compel the entry.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

6. Mandamus (§ 6*) — Relief — Clerk of Court.

Where petitioner was refused an order putting defendant in default on the same facts as were before the court on mandamus to compel the entry of such default, the court will not command the clerk to enter the default, since it will not compel parties to perform acts in conflict with an order or writ of another court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

7. Mandamus (§ 10*) — Relief — Doubtful Right.

It is the policy of the law that every case be tried upon its merits, and where it is sought to prevent such trial by entry of a default, upon a showing which presents no hardship to the party asking the relief, and the case is one where the right to the relief is doubtful, the parties should be remitted to a trial upon the merits and mandamus to compel the entry of the default denied.

Mandamus by Mattie E. Davidson against Eugene D. Graham. Peremptory writ denied.

See, also, 141 Pac. 834.

Webster, Webster & Blewett, of Stockton, for petitioner. A. H. Carpenter and Walter F. Lynch, both of Stockton, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an application for a writ of mandate commanding defendant to enter the default of A. T. Karry in a certain action wherein Mattie E. Davidson is plaintiff and Samuel Hinckley and A. T. Karry are defendants, now pending in the superior court of San Joaquin county.

It appears from the amended petition that the action above referred to was commenced to recover judgment upon a bond, in which Hinckley and Karry were sureties, to stay execution in a certain action entitled Emanuel Gjurich, Plaintiff, v. Fanny Fieg, Defendant, pending in the superior court of San Joaquin county. Petitioner is assignee of the assignee of plaintiff in said action last referred to. Summons in the present action was duly served on Karry February 13, 1913, and on July 28, 1913, he filed therein a general demurrer, and a demurrer also to the jurisdiction of the court. It further appears from the petition that on August 18, 1913—

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"there was entered into and filed in said action a stipulation in the words and figures as follows, to wit:

"'[Title of Court and Cause.] It is hereby stipulated and agreed that no default shall be taken against the defendant A. T. Karry, he waiving his demurrer, and that the said defendant A. T. Karry shall have to and inclusive of September 15, 1913, in which to file and serve his answer on the merits. Dated this 18th day of August, 1913.

"'Webster, Webster & Blewett,
"'Attorneys for Plaintiff.

"'I agree to the above stipulation:

"'A. H. Carpenter,
"'Attorney for Defendant A. T. Karry,
"'By Walter F. Lynch, Clerk.'"

The demurrer above referred to was similarly signed. It is alleged that Mr. Lynch was authorized by Mr. Carpenter to sign both the demurrer and stipulation in his name, and that both were signed with the knowledge and consent of Karry. We understand that no question is now raised as to Lynch's authority to act in the matter.

It is alleged in the petition that:

"It was distinctly agreed and understood that, by reason of the plaintiff's giving and granting to said defendant A. T. Karry to and inclusive of September 15, 1913, in which to file and serve his answer on the merits, the said demurrer should be and was waived and withdrawn, and that no default should be taken against the defendant Karry if his answer on the merits should be filed on or before said September 15, 1913, but, if said answer should not be filed on or before September 15, 1913, then such default might be taken."

It is then alleged that several oral stipulations were entered into extending the time in which Karry might answer, "but no oral stipulation extended the time to later than the 30th day of November, 1913"; that on December 1, 1913, plaintiff filed with the clerk of the court a demand as follows:

"In this action the defendant A. T. Karry having been regularly served with process, and having failed to appear and demur or answer the plaintiff's complaint within the time prescribed by law, and stipulation, and the legal time for demurring or answering having expired, application is hereby made by the plaintiff to the clerk of said court for the entry of a default against said defendant A. T. Karry. Dated December 4, 1913.

"Webster, Webster & Blewett,
"Attorneys for Plaintiff."

It is alleged that all legal fees were at the same time tendered said clerk, but that he "refused to enter said default." It further appears that on December 16, 1913, plaintiff served upon defendant's attorney, Carpenter, and filed a notice that he would on December 23, 1913, move the court "for its order that plaintiff take a judgment against the defendant A. T. Karry on the grounds that said defendant A. T. Karry has not answered to the complaint of plaintiff herein within the time allowed by law. Said motion is based and will be heard upon the records in this action including this notice of motion." Thereafter, and on the same day, to wit, December 16, 1913, defendant Karry, by his attorney, A. H. Carpenter, served and filed a general demurrer to the complaint in the action, and on January 19, 1914, the said motion having come on to be heard, the court made an order "denying plaintiff's motion for judgment herein without prejudice, to which ruling counsel for plaintiff duly excepts."

Petitioner claims that, when the demand was made upon the clerk to enter Karry's default, it became the duty of the clerk, in the exercise of a mere ministerial act, to comply with the request; citing section 585, Code of Civil Procedure:

"Judgment may be had if the defendant fails to answer the complaint as follows: (1) In an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money damages only, if no answer has been filed with the clerk of the court, within the time specified in the summons or such other time as may have been granted, the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the default of the defendant."

When the matter was here on the original petition, it did not appear that said stipulation was executed by defendant Karry, nor that it was executed by Karry's attorney, but by the attorney's clerk whose authority to sign the name of the attorney was not shown. Nor did it appear that there was any oral agreement or understanding not expressed in the stipulation.

[1] The amended petition, however, alleges that the stipulation was executed with the consent of Karry, and that Mr. Lynch was authorized to execute it for Attorney Carpenter, and on demurrer to the petition we must assume this to be the fact.

[2, 3] The demurrer filed by Karry's attorney was an appearance and was an answer, within the meaning of the provision of the Code, above quoted. Section 1014, Code Civ. Proc.

[4] It is irregular to enter a judgment against a defendant, in whose behalf a demurrer has been filed, without disposing of the demurrer, and a judgment so entered will be reversed on appeal. Hestres v. Clements, 21 Cal. 425.

It is contended, however, that the effect of the stipulation waiving the demurrer was to withdraw it from the case, leaving defendant Karry with no other right than to answer within the time given him by the stipulation. In the opinion written by Mr. Justice Burnett, some doubt was expressed as to whether a demurrer could be waived, as it presents an issue of law which must be tried by the court (section 591, Code Civ. Proc.); and, there being no statutory provision for waiving a demurrer, to effectually dispose of it some order of the court might probably be required. But it was also said that, conceding the effect of the stipulation to be as claimed—

"it would at least appear doubtful whether, according to its terms, the clerk should enter the > default of defendant Karry. Therein it is provided that 'no default shall be taken against the defendant A. T. Karry.' As to this covenant, there is certainly no express limit as to time. Probably the parties signing the paper intended to provide that no default would be taken prior to September 15, 1913, but, if so, it should have been more clearly expressed, and it is not an unreasonable construction that, in view of the waiver of the demurrer, no default was to be taken, although there was no express agreement to extend the time to answer beyond September, 15, 1913."

We venture to suggest further that it is very doubtful whether the waiver of the demurrer was intended to effect a withdrawal of defendant's appearance, or whether it was anything more than an agreement not to urge it. It is quite certain that plaintiff treated defendant as having appeared by stipulating with him and filing the stipulation. And he says in his petition that he granted several other extensions of time, orally, in which to answer.

[5] However this may be, when the demand was made upon the clerk, he had before him, as authority for entering defendant's default, nothing but this stipulation, indefinite as to its meaning and accompanied by no evidence that it was signed either by the authority of the defendant or his attorney. It is true that the amended petition shows that such authority existed, and that it was agreed that, unless an answer was filed by September 15, 1913, a default might be taken, but there is no averment or evidence that the clerk knew such to be the fact. He had a right to act, and the correctness of his act must be judged upon what was before him as a basis for the demand.

> "The right which it is sought to protect must be clearly established, and the writ is never granted in doubtful cases. The person seeking the relief must show a clear, legal right to have the thing sought by it done, and done in the manner and by the person sought to be coerced." High's Ex. Legal Rem. § 9.

We have seen that there was here both a doubt as to the right of the petitioner to the relief sought and the duty of the respondent to grant it.

[6] Furthermore, inasmuch as petitioner sought an order of the trial court for the same relief in the same action and on the same facts as were before the clerk, and was refused, we should hesitate to command the clerk to do the thing which, on petitioner's application, the court had in effect ordered should not be done.

It has been held that a court will not compel parties to perform acts which would subject them to punishment, or which would put them in conflict with the order or writ of another court. Id., § 23. The same rule should apply where a clerk is asked to perform an act when it would put him in conflict with a valid order made by the same court in the same action and upon the same matter.

[7] It is the policy of the law that every case should be tried upon its merits, and where it is sought to prevent this upon a showing which presents no circumstances of hardship to the party asking the relief, and the case is one where the right to the relief is so doubtful as it is in this case, we think the parties should be remitted to a trial upon the merits.

The peremptory writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by Amy C. Puterbaugh against F. P. McCray. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Houghton & Houghton, of San Francisco, for appellant. J. C. Hizar and Johnson W. Puterbaugh, both of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Action in form by common count for money had and received for the benefit of respondent. The amount involved was the sum of $1,000. Plaintiff had judgment, from which the defendant appealed and presents the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The testimony introduced on behalf of the plaintiff (and there was none submitted in support of appellant's answer) showed that defendant held an equal interest in certain real property in the county of San Diego with the husband of plaintiff; that, desiring to dispose of the same, a purchaser was found by the owners, who agreed to pay therefor the sum of $7,000; an escrow agreement was prepared and left with a title company at San Diego, together with a deed of the property signed by defendant and plaintiff's husband. The sum of $4,000 was paid shortly after the making of the escrow and a few months later the balance of $3,000 was received by the defendant who, throughout the transaction with the title company, was authorized to collect the proceeds of the sale on behalf of his co-owner as well as himself. At the time the escrow transaction was closed the husband of plaintiff instructed defendant to pay over the share of the proceeds which were received for the former, to the plaintiff, his wife, and pursuant to this agreement $2,500 of the first $4,000 received was paid over to the plaintiff. Defendant had agreed that in view of the fact that plaintiff and her husband were in need of money, he would pay over the amount mentioned, which was in excess of one-half of the sum first received, and that out of the final payment of $3,000 he would retain $2,000 and pay over $1,000, which would equalize the amounts to be received by both interests. After defendant had been paid the sum of $3,000 he refused to turn over any part of the same to the plaintiff, and wrote a letter to plaintiff's husband, stating that he thought the circumstances warranted him in holding the amount as a sinking fund, and referred to some promise made for the taking of legal action against third parties, which matter was not shown by any evidence to constitute any excuse for his failure to pay over the $1,000 which he had received in his capacity as a trustee. There was some slight testimony as to defendant having paid a claim made against plaintiff's husband by one Whitney, but no authority so to do was shown to have been vested in him. His entire defense as made upon this appeal hangs upon the contention that the complaint did not set forth that any assignment had been made by plaintiff's husband to the plaintiff of the right to receive moneys collected, and that therefore, as defendant was entitled to have the action prosecuted in the name of the real party at interest, the judgment entered against him was unauthorized.

[1, 2] Presumptively, of course, one-half of the money collected on account of the sale of the real property belonged to plaintiff's husband. His right to that money was the subject of an assignment, and there can be no doubt but that the assignment could be expressed orally as well as in writing.

The request of one party to his debtor that the latter shall pay money due the former to a third party has often been held to constitute an equitable assignment of the debt. Brady v. Ranch Mining Co., 7 Cal. App. 182, 94 Pac. 85; Curtner v. Lyndon, 128 Cal. 35, 60 Pac. 462.

In order to constitute an equitable assignment no express words are necessary, if from the entire transaction it clearly appears that the intention of the parties is to pass title. McIntyre v. Hauser, 131 Cal. 11, 63 Pac. 69.

[3] And where such equitable assignment is shown, the real party in interest, and who should prosecute the action, is the assignee. Wiggins v. McDonald, 18 Cal. 126.

[4] The direction by the plaintiff's husband to the defendant, and which we think was sufficient under the circumstances of the case to constitute an equitable assignment of the moneys to be collected, was given prior to the time that the defendant received the money, so that, the assignment having become complete, the defendant, when the money was paid to him, received that part of it for which he was liable to account, to and for the use and benefit of the plaintiff here, as alleged in the complaint. Under such circumstances there is no good reason why the complaint should have set forth the facts concerning the assignment. The defendant not only had notice prior to the receipt of the moneys that were to be paid over to the plaintiff, but he actually acted upon that direction and paid the first installment of $2,500 to her. No error is shown which requires that the judgment as entered be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 93*)—NUISANCE—PROSECUTION—JURISDICTION—MISDEMEANOR.

Under Pen. Code, § 1425, giving police and justices' courts exclusive jurisdiction of misdemeanors punishable by a fine not over $500 or by imprisonment not over six months, section 19, declaring that, unless expressly provided to the contrary, every misdemeanor shall be punishable by a fine of not over $500 or imprisonment for not over six months, the violation of section 373a, declaring the establishment or keeping within any city of a pesthouse, hospital, or place for those afflicted with contagious diseases a misdemeanor, without prescribing the penalty therefor, was a misdemeanor triable only in the police or justices' courts, and not within the jurisdiction of the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 129, 137–166; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 3*)—INDICTABLE MISDEMEANOR — MAINTAINING PUBLIC NUISANCE—"CIVIL CODE."

Such offense could not be held an indictable misdemeanor within the jurisdiction of the superior court by reading Pen. Code, § 373a, with section 377, relating to registration of deaths and burials, subdivision 5 of which declares every willful violation of any public health law a misdemeanor punishable, unless a different punishment is prescribed, by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $1,000, since section 377 deals with but a single subject, and the violation referred to in subdivision 5 is controlled by the introductory paragraph to the entire section; and the fact that Civ. Code, § 3491, provides that a public nuisance may be remedied either by indictment or information does not confer jurisdiction upon the superior court, since the "Civil Code" is but a statement of the substantive law, and the section does not prescribe procedure by which the criminal remedy against a public nuisance, not amounting to an indictable misdemeanor, may be enforced, as appears from section 3492, declaring the remedy by indictment or information to be regulated by the Penal Code.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

James Gibbs was charged by information with maintaining a public nuisance, and from an order sustaining a demurrer to the information, the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and Louis Ferrari, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People. G. Gunzendorfer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant in this case, in an information filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, was charged with maintaining a public nuisance in violation of the provisions of section 373a of the Penal Code.

[1] The defendant demurred to the information upon the ground that the offense charged was a misdemeanor which the superior court did not have original jurisdiction to hear and determine. The demurrer was allowed, upon the ground stated, and the people have appealed. The demurrer was well taken and properly allowed. The police and justices' courts have exclusive jurisdiction over all misdemeanors punishable by a fine not to exceed $500 or by imprisonment not to exceed six months; and, unless expressly provided to the contrary, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by a fine not to exceed $500 or by imprisonment not to exceed six months. Pen. Code, §§ 19, 1425.

Section 373a of the Penal Code, under which the defendant was informed against, expressly declares the offense defined therein to be a misdemeanor, but does not prescribe the penalty therefor. It follows necessarily that the offense charged against the defendant falls within the category of misdemeanors which are triable only in the police or justices' courts.

[2] The information in the present case cannot be sustained upon the theory that it charges an indictable misdemeanor. The contention of the people in this behalf is based upon the assumption that section 373a of the Penal Code, under which the information was drawn, may be rightfully read and construed in conjunction with the provisions of section 377 of the Penal Code. This cannot be done. The latter section undoubtedly deals only with violations of health laws relating to registrations of deaths and the disposition of human remains. Clearly the provisions of that section have no express or implied relation to the offense defined by section 373a. Section 377 was intended to penalize only the willful omission by any person charged with a duty relating to the registration of deaths to do certain things concerning such registration and the burial of the dead. True, subdivision 5 of that section in general terms declares that the willful violation of any of the laws of this state relating to the preservation of the public health constitutes a misdemeanor which is, "unless a different punishment * * * is prescribed, * * *, punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars"; but subdivision 5 of the section under consideration cannot be construed as a statute separate and apart from that which appears before in the section itself. The Code section in question deals with but a single subject, and therefore must be construed in its entirety in order to arrive at a correct conclusion concerning its intent and purpose. When so construed, it is manifest that the violation generally referred to in subdivision 5 relates to, is covered by, and must be controlled by the provisions of the introductory paragraph to the entire section. So construed, it is evident that subdivision 5 must be understood as applying only to those persons who are charged by law with a duty relating to the registration of deaths, etc. Ex parte Keeney, 84 Cal. 304, 310, 24 Pac. 34.

The fact that section 3491 of the Civil Code provides, among other things, that a public nuisance may be remedied either by an indictment or an information does not avail to confer upon the superior court jurisdiction to hear and determine the particular misdemeanor charged against the defendant. The Civil Code generally, and more particularly with reference to the specific subject in mind, is but a statement of the substantive law. While section 3491 of that Code very properly designates either an indictment or an information as one of the remedies which may be invoked against the maintenance of a public nuisance, nevertheless that section does not undertake to prescribe and limit the precise procedure by which the criminal remedy against a public nuisance not amounting to an indictable misdemeanor may be enforced. That this is so is evidenced by the fact that section 3492 of the same Code emphatically and unequivocally declares that "the remedy by indictment or information is regulated by the Penal Code."

It will thus be seen that the Civil Code, in keeping with its general purpose, merely states the substantive law relating to the criminal remedy which may be directed against a public nuisance, and then very properly relegates the regulation of the remedy to the provisions of the Penal Code, which, containing the adjective law, provides the criminal procedure for the prevention and punishment of crimes. If the Penal Code has omitted to provide for the prosecution by indictment or information of a public nuisance, amounting only to an ordinary misdemeanor, this court cannot supply the omission.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Thomas Moran and another were convicted of an attempt to commit burglary, and from an order denying new trial, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John M. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying the defendant Moran's motion for a new trial.

The appellant, together with one Stephen Burton, was charged by information with the crime of attempting to commit burglary. Upon the trial Burton was acquitted, and Moran was convicted. In the information appellant was also charged with two prior convictions, which, upon arraignment, he admitted.

[1] During the trial Moran took the witness stand and testified in his own behalf. Upon cross-examination, over his objection, he admitted that he had previously been convicted of a felony. He now assigns as error the action of the court overruling his objections to the questions which elicited this evidence. Having submitted himself as a witness, he was subject to the same tests for ascertaining the truth as any other witness who takes the witness stand. People v. Arnold, 116 Cal. 682, 48 Pac. 803; People v. Martini, 21 Cal. App. 743, 132 Pac. 1069. His objection in this respect was therefore not well taken.

[2, 3] Upon further cross-examination, and in answer to the question, "How often have you been convicted of a felony?" the defendant answered, "Three times." The objection that the state was confined by the information to disclosing but two convictions, having come, as it did, after the answer, was too late to preserve the point for the consideration by this court. Moreover, if, upon cross-examination, it was permissible, as going to the witness' credibility, to ask if he had ever been convicted of a felony, it would seem to follow that the witness might also be asked how often he had been so convicted, as tending to throw light upon the same point.

[4] The court's omission to instruct the jury that the purpose of admitting the testimony with reference to prior convictions was for the sole purpose of impeachment was not error; since the defendant made no request for such instruction. People v. Oliveria, 127 Cal. 376, 59 Pac. 772; People v. Winthrop, 118 Cal. 85, 50 Pac. 390.

No error was committed by the court in its instructions to the jury. The instructions of the court upon the subject of intoxication were not inconsistent, and correctly stated the law upon the subject. People v. Young, 102 Cal. 411, 36 Pac. 770; People v. Dowell, 141 Cal. 493, 75 Pac. 45.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HAMILTON v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

(S. F. Nos. 7178–7188, 7219, 7220.)

In Bank. Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Actions by William H. Hamilton, by Sidney J. Pringle, by the French Savings Bank, by Clarence C. Burr, by George C. Boardman, Jr., by Mary N. Allyne, by Mary M. Allyne and others, by Frank A. Somers, as executor of the last will of Harvey C. Somers, deceased, by the Savings & Loan Society, by Josephine E. Preston, by George F. Lyon, by Arita Moore, and by Edwin Schwab against the City and County of San Francisco. From the judgments, plaintiffs and defendant appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for plaintiffs. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Jesse H. Steinhart, both of San Francisco, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiffs herein sued to recover the aggregate amounts of certain taxes respectively levied for three specific purposes by the defendant's board of supervisors for the fiscal year 1907–08. These taxes had been paid by plaintiffs under protest. The taxes so levied are the same as those involved in the case of Charles Josselyn v. City and County of San Francisco (S. F. No. 6074, decided by this court on October 2, 1914) 143 Pac. 705. The court below gave judgments therein in favor of plaintiffs for the aggregate amounts paid by them on account of two of the items of taxation involved, but held that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the further amounts paid by them on account of the special tax levied under Ordinance No. 233 (New Series) for the repair, sprinkling, and sweeping of streets. The defendant has appealed from the judgments thus rendered in favor of plaintiffs; and the plaintiffs have also appealed from said judgments in so far as the same denied to said plaintiffs the right to recover the amounts so paid by them for a tax purporting to have been levied for the repair, sprinkling and sweeping of streets. Both sets of appeals have been submitted to this court on stipulation and on the transcript and briefs in the aforesaid Josselyn Case (S. F. No. 6074); and in accordance with the opinion and determination of this court in that case, the judgments herein of the lower court, in so far as they are in favor of plaintiffs, are affirmed, and the parts of said judgments from which the plaintiffs appealed are reversed, with instructions to the trial court to amend its conclusions of law therein, in accordance with the views expressed by this court in its opinion given and made on October 2, 1914, in the aforesaid case of Josselyn v. City and County of San Francisco, S. F. No. 6074, and to enter judgments herein in favor of plaintiffs for the amounts prayed for in the complaints respectively.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by H. P. Conner against Mary D. Plank and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and said defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Richard J. Culver, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Roy V. Reppy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff. The findings of fact in this case state that on September 8, 1911, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the defendant Mary D. Plank, whereby the defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff one-half of certain moneys theretofore received by her from F. W. Partridge, and also to pay to plaintiff, on the distribution of the estate of said Partridge, deceased, one-half of the net value of said estate as the same should be distributed to her, and that in consideration of said agreement on the part of defendant the plaintiff agreed to obtain forthwith an assignment to him of all interest of his mother Mary Abigail Conner in the said estate, she being the sole heir at law of said Partridge, deceased, at the time of his death; and plaintiff further agreed not to institute any proceedings for the contest of the will of said deceased, and to relinquish to defendant all claims of his said mother in and to the property of said Partridge, deceased, and of his said estate. It is further found that the plaintiff performed all of the terms of the contract made by him, and that the defendant has neglected and refused to perform her part of said contract, although the entire estate was distributed to her and no contest of the will was made.

There is no dispute as to the correctness of the amount of the judgment, if plaintiff is entitled to recover anything. The only questions presented have reference to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings which were made in favor of plaintiff as to the making of the contract. F. W. Partridge died in Los Angeles county, leaving an estate in that county, and there his alleged will was offered for probate. According to the terms of said will the entire estate was given to the defendant (who was not an heir at law of the decedent), except that the sum of $10 was bequeathed to the plaintiff. The plaintiff came to Los Angeles from an Eastern state and on behalf of his mother was preparing to contest the alleged will. He engaged as his attorney Gurney E. Newlin, and the defendant was represented by Samuel M. Haskins, also an attorney at law. In the testimony of Mr. Newlin and Mr. Haskins there is ample evidence that the terms of the alleged agreement were fully understood between them; they are the terms which were offered by Mr. Newlin and accepted by Mr. Haskins. No question exists as to the authority of Mr. Newlin to represent the plaintiff. On the other hand, it appears that Mrs. Plank stated in the presence of Newlin that she would do anything that Mr. Haskins advised her to, and that any agreement that Mr. Haskins reached with Newlin was satisfactory to her. The testimony of Haskins shows that Mrs. Plank was fully informed about the terms of the agreement, that later in the day she expressly gave her sanction to the same in a telephone message to Haskins, and that Haskins thereupon informed Newlin of his understanding that the matter was to be settled upon the basis already outlined.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The principal question of law on this appeal arises out of the fact that arrangements were made for reducing the agreement to writing and the writing was not completed or signed. There is no evidence of any statement made that the result which had been arrived at from the negotiations was not to constitute a contract, unless completed in writing. In proposing to put the terms in writing, it was assumed that they had been agreed upon. Newlin suggested to Haskins that it would be advisable to put the terms of the agreement that had been reached in writing. These transactions took place on September 8, 1911. On the morning of September 9th the attorneys met at the office of Haskins and commenced the dictation of the proposed written instrument. While they were so engaged Mrs. Plank communicated with Haskins by telephone, and informed him that, having discussed the matter with some friends, she had decided that she would enter into no compromise whatever. The preparation of the writing was thereupon suspended and was never resumed.

Counsel for appellant relies upon the proposition that, where parties have agreed to reduce an understanding to writing, it never becomes a binding agreement until it is written and is signed by the parties to it. The principal cases relied upon in support of appellant's position are Pacific R. & M. Co. v. Railway Co., 90 Cal. 632, 27 Pac. 525, Spinney v. Downing, 108 Cal. 666, 41 Pac. 797, and Las Palmas Winery & Distillery v. Garrett & Co., 167 Cal. 397, 139 Pac. 1077 (March 17, 1914). These cases go no further than to establish the rule that, when it is a part of the understanding between the parties in negotiating the terms of their contract that the same be reduced to writing and signed by the parties, the assent to its terms must be evidenced in the manner agreed upon or it does not become a binding or completed contract. The record in each of the three cases above cited showed that the parties understood that the agreements were not to become binding upon either until evidenced in the written form. When the facts are as last stated, the rule relied upon here by the appellant will apply; but where, on the other hand, the contract is of such a nature that the law does not require it to be in writing, and the terms of the contract are in the first instance definitely agreed upon and completed, then the mere fact that immediately thereafter they agree to evidence the contract by a written instrument does not interfere with the force and effect of the oral agreement.

Upon the other points mentioned in appellant's brief we find evidence sufficient to support the finding that the parties to the contract had been definitely ascertained, that the attorneys did have authority to bind their principals, and that the contract contained definite promises on each side sufficient to constitute a legal consideration.

FOGG v. McADAM. (Civ. 1504.)

1. Brokers (§ 43*)—Compensation—Authority in Writing.

Defendant in writing authorized brokers to negotiate an exchange of city property for a ranch owned by P., the writing providing that the offer was made subject to again looking over the ranch within one week. The offer was not accepted by P., and defendant, having inspected the ranch again within one week, withdrew his offer. Thereafter he orally requested the brokers to negotiate an exchange for a part of the ranch upon other and different terms, and as a result of the brokers' efforts an agreement to make such exchange was entered into. Held, that the brokers' services in negotiating this exchange were not rendered pursuant to a contract or memorandum in writing authorizing them to perform such services, within Civ. Code, § 1624, providing that an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or commission is invalid, unless it or some memorandum thereof is made in writing, as under the written authorization the employment was not general, but contemplated an exchange of specific properties upon specified terms, and when it was withdrawn the relations between defendant and the brokers were precisely as though the writing had never been executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

2. Brokers (§ 43*)—Compensation—Authority in Writing.

Under Civ. Code, § 1624, where a written authorization to brokers is for the exchange of specific property, and not a general authorization to sell, it cannot be modified orally.

3. Brokers (§ 82*)—Actions for Commissions—Complaint.

In a brokers' action for bringing about an agreement for exchange, which the complaint alleged defendant consented that the other party might rescind, where, though it appeared that the agreement contemplated that the property to be taken by defendant should be free of incumbrances, except as therein stated, which fact was to be evidenced by a certificate of title delivered with the deed, it was not alleged that the property was free from such incumbrance, nor that such certificate of title was furnished, the complaint, when construed most strongly against the pleader, was insufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by W. K. Fogg against James McAdam. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. W. Sorenson, of Los Angeles, for appellant. J. H. Merriam, of Pasadena, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover a broker's commission for negotiating an exchange of real estate. The sole question involved is the ruling of the court in sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint. Upon the making of the order and plaintiff's declining to amend, judgment was entered for defendant, from which plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The complaint alleges: That on May 11, 1911, defendant in writing authorized Merrill & Fogg, plaintiff's assignors, to negotiate an exchange of certain real estate then owned by him for certain ranch property, consisting of 480 acres, owned by one W. E. Premo. The written authorization, as set forth in the complaint, is as follows:

"Pasadena, Cal., May 11, 1911.

"Messrs. Merrill & Fogg—Gentlemen: As per agreement to make you a definite offer on the Premo ranch of 480 acres, will make the following offer: First, said Premo to take the property shown him on Colorado street for $50,000, and I retain a portion of lot No. 2, in the rear, and give him right of way across the rear of lot No. 1, so that he would have access to the rear of his buildings, also house and lot on Morningside Ave., east of Huntington Drive, lot No. 15, Culver subdivision, and assume the mortgage on his ranch for $10,000 and $8,000 in cash within 60 days, and also $900 commission. This offer is made subject to again looking over the ranch within one week from the above date.

"[Signed] James McAdam."

That thereupon Merrill & Fogg undertook the negotiation of an exchange and endeavored to induce said Premo to accept the offer and make the exchange of the properties described as proposed by defendant. Not only is there a failure to allege the acceptance of the offer on the part of Premo, but it is alleged that defendant, as he reserved the right to do, inspected the property of Premo within a week after the date of making the proposal and withdrew the same. Thereafter as alleged in the complaint, defendant orally requested plaintiff's assignors to secure Premo's consent to an exchange of a part of the ranch (being the property described in the within authorization, less 80 acres) upon other and different terms and considerations than those specified in the withdrawn written proposal made by defendant. That, pursuant to this request, plaintiff's assignors did bring defendant and Premo together, and as a result of their efforts defendant and Premo entered into a written contract for the exchange of certain properties other than those described in the written authorization so withdrawn by defendant, and upon other and entirely different terms and conditions from those therein specified.

[1, 2] Clearly the written authorization cannot be deemed a basis for recovery for the reason, first, that it is not alleged that Premo ever accepted defendant's offer; and, second, it is alleged that defendant upon looking the land over withdrew the offer, as he had a right to do. Under the written authorization the employment was not general, but, at most, contemplated the exchange of specific properties and upon certain specified terms. Conceding that plaintiff's assignors were instrumental in bringing about the execution of a contract between defendant and Premo for the exchange of their properties, such service was not rendered pursuant to any contract or memorandum in writing authorizing them to perform such service. Smith v. Post, 138 Pac. 705. Appellant insists that the oral request, under and in accordance with which the service was rendered, is sufficient, when considered as a modification of the writing. When the written proposal with withdrawn, the relations between defendant and plaintiff's assignors were precisely as though the writing had never been executed; hence there was no written authority to modify, and the alleged oral contract was therefore an original agreement governed by the provisions of section 1624, Civil Code, which requires such contracts, in order to enable the broker to recover, to be in writing. Moreover, where the contract, as here alleged, is for the exchange of specific property, and not a general authorization to sell, there can be no oral modification. "Were it possible to make an oral modification of a contract which by the statute of frauds is required to be in writing and enforce such oral modification, the door would be open for the perpetration of such frauds as the statute seeks to prevent." Boyd v. Big Three Ranch Co., 22 Cal. App. 108, 133 Pac. 623.

[3] We think the complaint also defective in that the contract (never consummated) contemplated that Premo's property should be free of all incumbrance other than as therein stated, which fact was to be evidenced by a certificate of title delivered to defendant with deed. It is not alleged that the property was free from such incumbrance, neither is it alleged that Premo furnished such certificate of title; hence, since pleadings are to be construed most strongly against the pleader, defendant's alleged unwillingness to consummate the exchange may have been due to failure of Premo's title, or existing incumbrance upon the property. Connor v. Riggins, 21 Cal. App. 756, 132 Pac. 849. The alleged consent of defendant that Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Horace Slater against S. A. Selover. From an order granting defendant's motion to set aside his default and vacate the judgment entered thereon, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Eugene C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for appellant. Walter V. Dysert and Walter T. Gunn, both of Los Angeles, and Jay Briggs, of Hoopestown, Ill., for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order of court granting defendant's motion to set aside his default and vacate the judgment entered thereon.

Defendant was duly served with summons and neglected to plead within the time prescribed therefor, whereupon his default for such failure was entered by the clerk, followed by the entry of judgment on February 27, 1914. On March 23d following, pursuant to notice thereof duly given, defendant, upon the grounds that he had a good and meritorious defense, and that his failure to plead was due to mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect, moved the court to vacate the judgment, set aside the default, and permit him to answer. This motion was supported by defendant's affidavit to the effect that, when served with summons, he expected to be engaged in business out of town, by reason of which fact he gave the papers to one Whipple, his business partner, and instructed him to attend to the matter and have the action defended, and, supposing Whipple had followed his instructions, he dismissed the subject from his mind, and did not discover such omission to answer until after default was entered. Whipple's affidavit, filed in support of the motion, corroborates that of Selover, in addition to which he merely avers that, upon the papers being delivered to him by Selover, he placed them in a pigeonhole, "and through mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect did not have an answer put in said case, and forgot all about said action until March 12th."

[1] We think the averments of the affidavit wholly insufficient to sustain the ruling of the court. At the very most, disregarding the conclusion, since no other facts are stated from which the court could find that defendant's omission was due to mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect, it appears the defendant intrusted and delivered the papers to Whipple, instructing him to have the action defended, and Whipple, as he says, "forgot all about said action." It would be difficult to conceive of a case possessing less merit.

[2] However this may be, the order is erroneous, for the reason that no sufficient affidavit of merits was presented, without which the order could not be made. Nevada Bank v. Dresbach, 63 Cal. 324; Quan Quock Fong v. Lyons, 20 Cal. App. 668, 130 Pac. 33. The only statement as to merits is contained in the affidavit of defendant, wherein he avers:

> "That affiant has a good and meritorious defense to said action, and wishes to defend same, and that affiant has stated his defense to his attorney, who informs him that he has a good defense to said action."

Such statement has been repeatedly held to be insufficient as an affidavit of merits. Nickerson v. California Raisin Co., 61 Cal. 268; People v. Larue, 66 Cal. 235, 5 Pac. 157; Cooper-Power v. Hanlon, 7 Cal. App. 724, 95 Pac. 678; Phillips v. Logan, 18 Cal. App. 287, 122 Pac. 1096. Not only does the affidavit limit the facts stated by defendant to his attorney to those constituting his defense, but such defense as stated may have been purely technical and without any merit whatsoever. Such affidavit should have shown that defendant stated all the facts of the case to his attorney, and not merely those constituting his defense.

The order is reversed.

MANSS v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MENDOCINO COUNTY.

(Civ. 1219.)

1. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE (§ 11*) — FELONY — INDICTMENT—STATUTES.

An indictment charged that defendant did willfully, etc., resist, delay, and obstruct C., a public officer, to wit, a constable of B. township, who was in the attempted discharge of his duty, being engaged in executing a writ of attachment issued out of the justice court in a specified case, under which he held in possession a lot of ties, and that defendant willfully, etc., obstructed such officer by taking a portion of the ties "by force and violence" from the officer's possession. Held, that such indictment stated an offense, within Pen. Code, § 69, declaring that every person who attempts, by any threat or violence, to deter an executive officer from performing any duty imposed on him by law, or who knowingly resists, by force or violence, such officer in the performance of his duty, shall be punished, etc.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 93*)—JURISDICTION—NATURE OF OFFENSE—STATUTES.

Pen. Code, § 102, provides that every person who willfully takes or attempts to take, or assists any person in taking or attempting to take, from the custody of any officer any personal property which such officer has in charge under any process of law, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Section 69 declares that every person who attempts, by threat or violence, to prevent an executive officer from performing any duty imposed on him by law, or who knowingly resists, by "force or violence," such officer in the performance of his duty, is punishable, etc. Held, that section 102 applies only in case of interference with an officer without force or violence, such offense not being within the jurisdiction of the superior court, while section 69 applies to obstruction of an officer by force or violence, and is within the superior court's jurisdiction.

3. OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE (§ 7*)—"EXECUTIVE OFFICER."

A constable is an "executive officer," within Pen. Code, § 69, providing that every person who attempts, by any threat or violence, to obstruct an executive officer in the performance of his duty, or who knowingly resists, by force or violence, such officer in the performance of his duty, is punishable, etc.

Application for a writ of prohibition by F. H. Manss to restrain the Superior Court of Mendocino County from trying petitioner on an indictment for obstructing a peace officer. Demurrer to petition sustained, and writ denied.

Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for petitioner. J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain respondent from trying petitioner on an indictment found by the grand jury of said county. The charging part of the indictment is as follows:

"The said F. H. Manss, on or about the 20th day of October, A. D. 1913, at the county of Mendocino, state of California, and before the finding of this indictment, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and knowingly resist, delay, and obstruct a public officer named M. M. Curtis, who was then and there a duly elected, qualified, and acting constable of Big River township, said county of Mendocino, state aforesaid, who was then and there in the discharge of and attempting to discharge his duty as such constable, being then and there engaged in the execution of a writ of attachment duly and regularly issued out of the justice court of Big River township, in said county of Mendocino, in the case wherein Mrs. Oddie Osborne was plaintiff and H. H. Ashley and George Ashley were defendants, under which said writ of attachment said M. M. Curtis, as constable as aforesaid, was in the possession of a certain lot of ties which he had attached under said writ, and said defendant did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and knowingly resist, delay, and obstruct said M. M. Curtis as a public officer as aforesaid, in the discharge of and attempting to discharge his duty as such constable by holding said ties under said attachment, and said defendant by force and violence and against the will of said officer did take a portion of the said ties so in his possession by authority of said writ of attachment as aforesaid from the possession of said officer."

[1] It is thus made plain that the grand jury and the district attorney had in view the offense characterized and condemned by section 69 of the Penal Code as follows:

"Every person who attempts, by means of any threat or violence, to deter or prevent an executive officer from performing any duty imposed upon such officer by law, or who knowingly resists, by the use of force or violence, such officer, in the performance of his duty, is punishable by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding five years."

It is clear, also, that the indictment sufficiently charges said offense. All that is required is to follow substantially the language of the statute. People v. Fowler, 88 Cal. 136, 25 Pac. 1110; People v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 281, 52 Pac. 658. It is, indeed, apparent that the charge is set forth with greater amplitude than is demanded.

[2] It is not disputed that the superior court has jurisdiction to try the offense contemplated by said section of the Penal Code. The contention, however, is that the charge is brought within the provisions of section 102, as follows:

"Every person who willfully injures or destroys, or takes or attempts to take, or assists any person in taking or attempting to take, from the custody of any officer or person, any personal property which such officer or person has in charge under any process of law, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

It is further contended that, since no punishment is therein prescribed, we must look for the penalty to section 19, as follows:

"Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by both."

There is no question that of said offense the superior court has no jurisdiction. Said section 102, however, has no application. That is designed for similar interference with the duties of an officer where no force and violence is used. If an individual should surreptitiously or peaceably take personal property from the custody of an officer who had it in charge under process of law, he would be guilty of said offense, and should be prosecuted in the justice court. It is to be observed that neither the term "force" nor "violence" is used in said section 102, while in section 69 an essential element is a "threat" or "force" or "violence." The difference in the gravity of the offenses is, of course, manifest.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[3] There is also, it may be said, another section, to wit, 148 of the Penal Code, which is general in its terms and applies to interference with or obstruction of "any" public officer in the discharge of his duty, while section 69 is limited to "executive" officers. A constable is manifestly an executive officer, and as the offense is plainly brought under said section 69, there is no merit in this application.

The demurrer is sustained, and the writ denied.

HATFIELD v. PEOPLE'S WATER CO. et al. (Civ. 1276.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 23, 1914.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 182*) — PUBLIC WATER COMPANY—FORFEITURE OF FRANCHISE — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

St. 1881, p. 55, § 7, providing that any company charging or attempting to collect water rates in excess of the fixed rates shall upon the complaint of any water rate payer and upon conviction forfeit its franchise to the city wherein the water is furnished, violates the constitutional provision declaring that any company collecting rates higher than those fixed shall forfeit its franchise to the city in which they are collected; since in view of Const. art. 1, § 21, providing that no special privilege shall be granted which may not be revoked, the only parties interested in the forfeiture are primarily the state, and then the city, and since supplementary legislation was not required to execute the constitutional provision for forfeiture.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 608*) — FORFEITURE OF CHARTER—ADJUDICATION.

A corporation is responsible only to the sovereignty by which it is created, and ordinarily conduct constituting a cause for the forfeiture of its charter and franchise will not ipso facto work a forfeiture, but the corporation exists until such sovereignty procures and enforces an adjudication of forfeiture.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Wm. H. Hatfield against the People's Water Company and another. From an order sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to amend, he appeals. Affirmed.

Milton Shepardson and H. A. Luttrell, both of Oakland, and R. M. F. De Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant. McKee & Tasheira, of Oakland, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. The prayer of the plaintiff's complaint in this action is that the franchises and waterworks of the defendant, Contra Costa Water Company, now claimed to be owned by its codefendant, People's Water Company, be declared forfeited to the city of Oakland. The appeal is from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's third amended complaint without leave to amend. The action is prosecuted by the plaintiff in his capacity as a private citizen; and the gist of his complaint is that he, as a water rate payer in the city of Oakland, was overcharged the sum of $3.67½ by the defendant Contra Costa Water Company, during a specified six months preceding the commencement of the action.

The plaintiff's right as a water rate payer to institute and maintain the action is rested solely upon the provisions of section 7 of the act of March 7, 1881, which read as follows:

> "Any person, company, association, or corporation charging, or attempting to collect from the persons, corporations, or municipalities using water, any sum in excess of the rate fixed as hereinbefore designated, shall, upon the complaint of * * * any water rate payer, and upon conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction * * * forfeit the franchises and water works of such person, company, association, or corporation to the city and county, city or town, wherein the said water is furnished and used." Stats. of 1881, p. 55.

[1, 2] It is the contention of the defendants that the act last referred to is unconstitutional in so far as it purports to confer upon a water rate payer the power to compel a forfeiture of the franchises and works of a water company because of an alleged overcharge. We are of the opinion that the contention is well taken and must be sustained. The legislative act in question, in so far as its forfeiture clause is concerned, is inconsistent with and in contravention of that provision of the Constitution which regulates the establishment of water rates, and declares that:

> "Any person, company, or corporation collecting water rates in any city and county or city or town in this state, otherwise than as so established, shall forfeit the franchises and waterworks of such person, company or corporation to the city and county, or city or town where the same are collected, for the public use."

The Constitution, it will be noted, provides that the offending company shall forfeit its franchises and waterworks for public use to the city where the excess rates are collected. Clearly, therefore, only two parties can be said to be interested in the procurement of the forfeiture provided for in the Constitution, viz., the state in the first instance, and, secondly, the city where an excess rate may have been collected. Obviously the state is primarily and directly interested because it is the sovereign power from whom the water company derives its charter and franchises (Const. § 21, art. 1); and manifestly the city where the excess rate has been collected is also interested because it is by the Constitution expressly made the beneficiary of any forfeiture which may be desired and declared at the behest of the state.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is the general rule that a corporation is responsible only to the sovereignty by whom it was created; and, ordinarily, conduct constituting a cause for the forfeiture of corporate charters and franchises will not ipso facto operate to produce such a forfeiture. Notwithstanding such conduct, "the corporation continues to exist until the sovereignty which created it shall * * * procure an adjudication of forfeiture, and enforce it." People v. Los Angeles Elec. Ry. Co., 91 Cal. 338, 340, 27 Pac. 673, 674. In other words, the revocation of corporate charters and franchises is a sovereign right which can be exercised only by the state or in its name.

It is clear that supplemental legislation was not required to execute the provision of the Constitution providing for a forfeiture of the franchises and works of such water companies as might be guilty of charging or collecting rates in excess of those established by law. The constitutional provision in this behalf is in itself complete and therefore controlling. Moreover, the Legislature was neither required nor permitted to enact a law which purported to confer a right in excess of and different from that contemplated by the Constitution. It will be seen at a glance that the right to initiate the forfeiture which the legislative enactment in question attempted to confer upon a water rate payer is neither expressly nor impliedly authorized by the provisions of the Constitution. And therefore the act to that extent is in conflict with the Constitution and to the same extent void.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Alton M. Cates against the Consolidated Realty Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Cates & Robinson and Stewart & Stewart, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action judgment was entered in favor of the defendant after an order had been made sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

In a certain action in the superior court, wherein Vickrey and another were plaintiffs and Maier and another were defendants, an attachment was issued and regularly served upon the defendant corporation, covering certain shares of stock belonging to the defendants in that action. The plaintiffs obtained judgment and at an execution sale by the sheriff they purchased said shares of stock and received a certificate of purchase, thereby becoming the owners of the stock. Between the date of the attachment and the time of the execution sale several dividends were declared by the corporation, some of which were paid to the defendants in the attachment suit, and one of which remains unpaid.

After the plaintiffs in the former action had purchased the stock at the sheriff's sale they transferred to this plaintiff "all their right, title and interest in and to said 34 shares of the stock above described, and all thereof." No assignment to plaintiff is alleged, except as shown by the language quoted in the preceding sentence.

[1] The position stated by appellant is that the right to dividends inheres in shares of corporate stock, and is held under levy of attachment on the shares and passes to the execution purchaser of shares attached. With this contention we agree, and it is not denied by the respondent. In McCarthy Co. v. Boothe, 2 Cal. App. 170, 83 Pac. 175, this court declared that all of the profits and dividends to accrue from attached stock are impounded equally with the stock itself. See, also, Cook on Corporations (5th Ed.) § 484.

[2] It is suggested, however, that the plaintiff cannot recover because the assignment under which he claims did not include any interest in past dividends. The transfer to him was of the stock only, and he took the stock as it stood. With this contention we agree. The plaintiff's position is precisely the same as if, without any attachment, the stock had been transferred by the owners thereof to the plaintiff after these dividends were declared. The fact that plaintiff's assignors might have maintained this action is of no benefit to plaintiff, since it is not shown that they transferred to plaintiff anything more than the stock as it stood when assigned to plaintiff.

[3] When the dividends were declared they became a personal debt from the corporation to the defendants Maier et al., but remained subject to the lien of the attachment. The execution sale, therefore, carried to the purchasers the right to these dividends, but this right retained its character as a right to the benefit of declared dividends and remained separate from the stock. Therefore the mere assignment of the stock did not carry with it a right of action on the dividends. 10 Cyc. 557; Cook on Corporations (4th Ed.) § 539; Hopper v. Sage, 112 N. Y. 530, 20 N. The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Annie Cain against Henry French. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 143 Pac. 67.

Henry French, of San Jose, in pro. per. W. A. Beasley, of San Jose, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. The appeal in this case was taken to this court and an opinion rendered and filed; but it appearing upon a petition for transfer to the Supreme Court that the action was one in equity, of which the appellate jurisdiction is in the Supreme Court, the petition for transfer was granted upon that ground. The case was subsequently by the Supreme Court transferred to this court for decision.

After a careful re-examination of the record and briefs, we are satisfied with the views expressed in our opinion heretofore filed, to which we adhere. That opinion is as follows:

"This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant for the cancellation of a promissory note dated October 19, 1909, for $400. In addition to his answer denying the averments of the complaint, defendant filed a cross-complaint, in which he prayed for judgment against the plaintiff for the amount of the note and costs. An answer to the cross-complaint was served and filed.

"The pleadings presented two issues, to wit: Was there a consideration for the note? (2) Was Annie Cain's signature to the note procured by undue influence?

"The case was tried before a jury, which returned a special and also a general verdict, finding both issues in favor of the plaintiff. Findings of facts and conclusions of law were filed; a motion for a new trial was denied, and the case is here on an appeal from the judgment and order denying said motion.

[1] "According to the story told by the defendant the plaintiff called on him at his law office in June, 1907, and stated to him that her uncle, a man of advanced age, with whom she had lived for 21 years, working hard for him during that time, had entirely changed his attitude toward her, and that she feared, from things he had said, that he would revoke a testamentary disposition theretofore made in her favor; that she instructed the defendant to interview her uncle, and if possible to persuade him to modify his attitude toward her, and either pay her for the services rendered him, or, in order that she might not be subject to his whims, to induce him to secure to her some of his property in recognition of her 21 years of service; that accordingly defendant interviewed plaintiff's uncle, and persuaded him to make her an absolute deed of 75 acres of land in Santa Clara valley, worth over $200 per acre. The evidence introduced by the defendant showed also that he rendered her other services, all which defendant claimed were worth more than the amount of the promissory note given to him by plaintiff, and that the note was accepted by him as a compromise of his original claim for fees.

"The evidence introduced by the defendant in support of his answer to the complaint tended to show that he sent his agent to the plaintiff a few days before the time when his claim for services rendered her would be barred by the statute of limitations; that at that time plaintiff stated that she was unable to pay the amount demanded, or any substantial amount; and that it was finally agreed between her and the agent that defendant would accept her promissory note for $400 in payment for said services; that plaintiff was in good health, and knew exactly what she was doing; that moreover no undue influence was attempted or exercised upon her.

"On the other hand, plaintiff testified, on the subject of defendant's services, that she applied to him, not as an attorney, but as an old friend of her uncle, and so stated to him at the time, and that her request to him was to intercede in her behalf with her uncle for permission to take a vacation, she being ill and needing a rest; that he did render her some service in this regard; and that she paid him for the same. She further testified that the defendant was instructed by her uncle to draw up a deed conveying to her his farm, which deed was to be substituted for some other form of disposition of the property which had theretofore been made to her; that she and her uncle called several times at the offices of the defendant for this deed, but being unable to find him in they finally went to another lawyer and employed him to draw the required instrument, by which there was conveyed to plaintiff by her uncle the land mentioned, which deed was duly executed and recorded; that the defendant was paid for his services concerning the deed, and his receipt therefor taken. In brief, as to this branch of the case, plaintiff's testimony is to the effect that the defendant was paid in full for all services rendered by him to her and her uncle.

"On this subject of the consideration for the note there is sufficient evidence given by the plaintiff to support the general verdict of the jury in her favor. Irrespective, then, of plaintiff's allegations of the employment by the defendant of undue influence in procuring the execution of the note, the defendant could not recover thereon. It becomes therefore unnecessary to go into a discussion of the evidence as to such undue influence upon which the special verdict of the jury was founded."

[2] In the petition for transfer to the Supreme Court we note that several points are made which were not theretofore raised. These we think are without substantial merit; but, in any event, points raised for the first time in a petition for rehearing or for transfer will not be considered. Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 221; Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, 25 Pac. 677, 12 L. R. A. 104; San Francisco v. Pacific Bank, 89 Cal. 23, 26 Pac. 615, 835.

SILVERIA v. ALEXANDER. (No. 1373.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1009*)—Review—Questions of Fact.

In an action to set aside a deed to the grantor's physician, a finding that no undue influence was exercised supported by material evidence could not be disturbed, even though the evidence showed a fiduciary relation between the grantor and grantee raising a presumption of fraud.

2. Deeds (§ 19*) — Consideration — Agreements to Support Grantor.

A deed to the grantor's physician in consideration of his agreement to make certain payments of money and to care for the grantor during the rest of her life was supported by a sufficient and adequate consideration in the absence of fraud, though the grantor died shortly afterwards, and the benefits received by her as a result of the contract were therefore small in comparison with the value of the property conveyed; it not appearing that her early death was expected when the deed was executed.

3. Deeds (§ 211*)—Mental Capacity—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action to set aside a deed, a finding of mental capacity was sustained by the evidence where five unimpeached witnesses testified that the grantor was not of weak or unsound mind, but on the contrary was a woman of exceedingly sound, independent, and strong mind, even assuming that the relation between the grantor and grantee was fiduciary and that the burden was therefore on the grantee to prove that the deed was made by the grantor while in full possession of her faculties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by Julia J. Silveria, as administratrix of Ellen E. Clark, deceased, against Paul C. Alexander. From an order denying a new trial after a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald & Abbott, of Oakland (Charles A. Beardsley, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant. Jordan, Rowe & Brann, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action in equity by the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of her mother, Ellen E. Clark, in which it is sought to have a certain deed to the premises described in the complaint set aside upon the ground that at the time the deed was made, Ellen E. Clark was acting under undue influence and was of such feeble mind as not to know what she was doing, and that no adequate consideration passed to her from the defendant for the property. Judgment went for the defendant. Thereafter, in due time, plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied; and this appeal is from that order.

For some time prior to the date of the deed, the property had stood of record in the name of Peter and Bona Wrancovich, who, in consideration for the deed to them, had agreed with Mrs. Ellen E. Clark, the deceased, to take care of her as long as she lived; if she needed money to get it for her, and to bury her; and they also loaned her $200. Thereafter, and while the decedent was at the California Woman's Hospital in San Francisco, feeling that she would be ill for some time and not being on good terms with any of her relatives, she, on the 2d day of April, 1909, sent for Peter Wrancovich. When he arrived, she told him that there would be a large expense to meet for the hospital and doctor, and, if she died, there would be also her funeral expenses to pay; that she had a splendid doctor, who was going to take care of her as long as she lived, which might be for a year or two.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"This expense," she said, "you cannot pay." Finally, she requested him to transfer the property to the defendant. Wrancovich was willing to make the requested deed upon payment to him of the $200 which he had advanced. The next morning, April 3, 1909, a deed from Wrancovich and wife to Dr. Paul C. Alexander was made and handed to Mrs. Clark, whereupon she sent for the defendant, and when he arrived said to him:

> "Doctor, here is the deed. You were a good doctor to me. You get the deed, and I get the rent; and you support me as long as I live."

To all of which the doctor agreed.

Subsequently Mrs. Clark was removed from the California Woman's Hospital in San Francisco to the Home of Incurables, also in San Francisco; and on the 19th day of April, 1909, 16 days after the Wrancoviches made the deed to the defendant, she, having been advised that it would be prudent to do so, herself executed a deed of the property to him. At the time of making this last deed, when asked by the attorney who drew it why she was doing so, she replied:

> "Dr. Alexander has been very kind to me; and he is one of the few friends that I have in the world. He not only has treated me when he thought I didn't have any money, but he has treated me ever since I was in the Woman's Hospital. He is going to take care of me and support me, and give me medical attention as long as I live."

These facts, which are undisputed, were corroborated by the testimony of several disinterested witnesses, as was also the fact that she was of sound mind at the time the deed was made. Upon the subject of the consideration for the deed, the defendant testified as follows:

> "There was an agreement or understanding between Mrs. Clark and me other than the money I paid for her in regard to the consideration for the deeds of April 3d and 19th. Mrs. Clark asked me to take care of her as long as she lived; and I certainly did. I gave her medical attendance all the time I agreed to; and I paid for her support and maintenance as I agreed to. I was to defray her funeral expenses, and I did that. I visited Mrs. Clark every day and sometimes twice a day for a period of about six weeks before her death; and I gave her the benefit of my medical skill and advice during that time."

It is admitted by counsel for the plaintiff that the defendant paid out altogether on account of the deceased $506. In addition to this sum, defendant testified that he visited Mrs. Clark 60 times, and that his visits were worth $5 apiece, making the further sum of $300. Mrs. Clark at the time of her death was 56 years old. She was the victim of cancer, and died six weeks after the making of the deed to Dr. Alexander. The deed dated April 19th to the defendant is the one sought by this action to be canceled and annulled.

As before stated, the findings of the trial court were in favor of the defendant; and the plaintiff now, as she did on the motion for a new trial, challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain those findings. She asserts that the defendant used undue influence to procure the deed, that the consideration for the deed was inadequate, and that the decedent was without sufficient understanding to make the transfer in question.

[1] Assuming that the evidence shows that a fiduciary relation existed between the defendant and Ellen E. Clark, sufficient to raise the presumption of fraud, still as the court found on material evidence that no undue influence was exercised on her by the defendant in order to procure the execution of the deed, we are unable, even if so inclined, which we are not, to disturb that finding.

[2] As to the claimed lack of consideration, it is sufficient to say that under the agreement the defendant was to make certain payments of money and to care for Ellen E. Clark during the remaining period of her life. He kept that agreement. True, she died shortly after the deed was executed; but there is nothing in the record to record to show that her early demise was to be expected. While the benefits received by her as a result of the contract were small in comparison with the value of the property conveyed, this is not a sufficient ground for setting it aside. In the absence of fraud, the amount of the consideration for the deed was immaterial. Driscoll v. Driscoll, 143 Cal. 528, 529, 77 Pac. 471.

It is not disputed, and it has been repeatedly held that a deed executed in consideration of a grantee's promise to furnish support to the grantor for life is based upon an adequate consideration. Norris v. Lilly, 147 Cal. 754, 82 Pac. 425, 109 Am. St. Rep. 188.

[3] Coming finally to the question concerning the capacity of Ellen E. Clark to make the deed, and again assuming that the relation between her and the defendant was fiduciary, and that for this reason the law casts upon the defendant the burden of proving that the deed was made by Mrs. Clark while in full possession of her faculties (Payne v. Payne, 12 Cal. App. 251, 254, 107 Pac. 148), still as five witnesses, all unimpeached, testified that she was not of weak or unsound mind, but on the contrary was a woman of exceedingly sound, independent, and strong mind, we are at a loss to see how it can be seriously contended that the finding as to her soundness of mind was not sustained by the evidence.

No other point urged merits consideration. The order is affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

REYNOLDS v. JACKSON. (Civ. 1242.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 21, 1914.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 53*)—EVIDENCE — EXISTENCE OF PARTNERSHIP.

Evidence, in an action for an accounting of an alleged partnership between plaintiff's assignor and defendant to procure options on and sell land, held to sustain a finding that plaintiff's assignor and defendant had not entered into a partnership.

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 328*) — ACTION FOR ACCOUNTING—EVIDENCE—PERFORMANCE.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1011*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 328*) — ACTION FOR ACCOUNTING—EVIDENCE—EXISTENCE OF AGREEMENT.

Evidence, in an action for an accounting of an alleged partnership between plaintiff's assignor and defendant to procure options on and sell land, held to sustain a finding that the parties orally agreed to divide the net commissions received by defendant on the sale of such land.

5. TRIAL (§ 397*)—FINDINGS—MATERIAL ISSUE.

In such action, where the trial court found that the parties entered into an agreement to share commissions from the sale of the land, provided plaintiff's assignor either sold or procured a purchaser for it, but that plaintiff's assignor did not perform his part of the agreement, the question whether defendant agreed to account to plaintiff's assignor for the commissions from the sale of the tract and to pay him one-half thereof was not a material issue, so as to require any finding thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by William H. Reynolds against George H. Jackson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for appellant. Wm. J. Herrin, of San Francisco, and A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff, as the assignee of W. B. Reynolds, brought this action for an accounting "of all the dealings and transactions of" an alleged copartnership, "and for such other and further relief as may be just," etc.

The complaint alleges that:

"On or about the 15th day of July, 1904, W. B. Reynolds and defendant, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, entered into and formed a copartnership, as equal partners, for the sole purpose of procuring options on, buying, selling, and dealing in, a certain tract of land, situated in the county of Sutter, in said state; and that said W. B. Reynolds and defendant thereupon entered upon and transacted said copartnership business. That said tract of land was on or about the 1st day of October, 1904, finally sold and disposed of, resulting in a profit to said partnership, as plaintiff is informed and believes, in at least the sum of $25,000."

It is further alleged that the defendant, at the time of the establishment of said copartnership, promised and agreed with said W. B. Reynolds to account to and pay over to him (Reynolds) his proportional share of all moneys received on account of said partnership and its dealings in said tract of land. It is then complained that the defendant has collected and received the whole of the profits accruing to the said copartnership by reason of the sale of said tract of land; that the profits so received amount to at least the sum of $25,000, and that the defendant has wrongfully, and without the assent of the plaintiff, appropriated the same to his own use and benefit; that neither the plaintiff nor said W. B. Reynolds has ever received or been paid any money by the defendant on account of said profits; that no settlement of said copartnership accounts has ever been made or had between the said W. B. Reynolds and the defendant or between the plaintiff and the defendant; that the plaintiff and said W. B. Reynolds have each frequently applied to and demanded of the defendant to come to a final settlement with respect to said copartnership accounts, but that the defendant has always refused, and still continues to refuse, to render either the plaintiff or to the said W. B. Reynolds any account whatsoever of the said copartnership affairs or of the copartnership money received by him; that it will appear upon a just and true settlement of the said copartnership account that a large sum of money will be due from said defendant in respect of said copartnership.

It is averred that on the 1st day of December, 1904, said W. B. Reynolds sold and transferred all his interest in said copartnership, its property, money, and demands, to the plaintiff.

The answer specifically denies each and all the material averments of the complaint.

The court found that said W. B. Reynolds and the defendant did not at any time enter into or form a copartnership as equal partners or otherwise, for the purposes mentioned in the complaint. The court did find, however, that the plaintiff's assignor and the defendant, on the 15th day of July, 1904, or thereabouts, entered into an oral agreement, by the terms of which the defendant agreed that, if the plaintiff's assignor would sell or find a purchaser for the tract of land referred to in the complaint, the defendant would divide with said W. B. Reynolds the net commissions to be received by him from the sale of said tract of land. But the court further found that "plaintiff's assignor did not sell said land, or any part thereof, nor did he find a purchaser for said land, or for any part thereof." As a conclusion of law from the facts as found, the court found that the plaintiff is not entitled to anything by reason of this action, and judgment passed to the defendant accordingly. The plaintiff appeals from said judgment and from the order denying him a new trial.

The points urged for a reversal are mainly that the findings are not supported, and that the court failed to find on a material issue.

It is unnecessary to give here a detailed or even an extended epitomized statement of the testimony of the plaintiff's assignor, W. B. Reynolds, and that of other witnesses called by him. Respecting the evidence offered and received in support of the complaint, it will be sufficient to say that said Reynolds testified to the formation, in July, 1904, by oral agreement, of a copartnership between himself and the defendant, as alleged in the complaint, and that other witnesses testified to facts and to declarations by the defendant tending strongly to corroborate the testimony of the plaintiff's assignor upon that point; that said Reynolds testified further that, upon the establishment of said copartnership, he at once proceeded to take steps to find a purchaser of the land to which the partnership agreement related, and that finally he met and talked with one E. Wineman, of San Luis Obispo (who was looking for an investment in land), relative to the land for the sale of which said alleged copartnership was formed, and that Wineman eventually, and within a short time after said conversation, purchased said land; that the defendant afterwards admitted to said Reynolds that he made a profit of $9,000 on the transaction, but denied that Reynolds was entitled to any part thereof.

The defendant testified, however:

> That he never at any time had any transaction involving the subject-matter of this action with W. B. Reynolds. "He [referring to said Reynolds] asked me if I had some land suitable for dredging and reclaiming," testified the defendant. "This was long before the sale was made. I had no transactions with Mr. Reynolds regarding the sale of land in Sutter county. I didn't have any transactions with the man at all. I had a conversation with him. I don't remember now just what time. He came to me on the street in front of the Lick House, some time along in the summer. That conversation did not relate to the land that Mr. Wineman purchased, only a small portion of it—to the portion of land that belonged to Antone Borel and Mr. Nutal. There were 4,700 acres in that tract. It was situated in Sutter county about three or four miles out from Marcuse. That is part of the land that I sold to Mr. and Mrs. Wineman and referred to in the depositions of Mr. and Mrs. Wineman just read. Regarding this land, Mr. Reynolds told me that he had a man who had two dredgers, and he was looking for a piece of land to buy, and he wanted the land where he could reclaim it, and wanted to know if I had land suitable for that business, and I mentioned this particular piece of land and told him that it might make a fairly good reclamation—this portion. I made an agreement with him regarding the sale of the land. The agreement was not in writing. After talking to me about the land, he spoke about this man and he said—he wanted to know the price, and I told him that, if this man would sell this land for $10, we would divide $2.50 an acre on the land. He would take $1.25 and I would take $1.25, if it was sold at $10. That is all the agreement I had with him. I never had any other agreement with him concerning any other land in Sutter county. That is the only piece of land that I had an agreement with him concerning the sale of. He never sold the land. He never came to me with the name of a purchaser. He told me several times on the street that somebody was going to come. I had not had the land for sale so very long; a few months. I had the land staked out—knew that I could get it any time I wanted it, but I told Mr. Borel that, whenever I found a purchaser, I would call on him for an option for this land; but I never got the option until away along in the latter part—I don't know—but it was the first of August, somewhere along there. The option was in writing. Mr. Borel signed it, but I did my business with his private secretary."

The defendant further testified that he thought that he introduced W. B. Reynolds to Wineman, the purchaser of the Sutter county lands. After Wineman had decided to buy the land through the defendant, the latter met Reynolds at the Lick House. Reynolds asked the defendant if he had sold Wineman "a lot of land" in Sutter county, and, upon an affirmative reply by the defendant, insisted that he (said Reynolds) having first brought Wineman's attention to said land, and thus put him in the way of making the purchase, was entitled to his share of the profits from the sale. The defendant replied to Reynolds: "I am not going to give you a red cent—not a cent." The defendant contradicted the testimony of certain witnesses called for the plaintiff to the effect that the defendant had said to them prior to the sale of the land to Wineman, that W. B. Reynolds was an equal partner with him in the option on and sale of said land and the profits accruing from said sale. The defendant further testified that he was under an agreement with Umbsen & Co., with whom he was connected, in so far as the handling of country real estate was concerned, whereby he was to pay said firm one-third of the profits on all sales of such lands made by him.

Wineman testified that his attention was first called to the land purchased by him by an advertisement that he observed in one of the San Francisco daily newspapers; that he and his wife thereafter went to San Francisco and called at the office of Umbsen & Co., where the advertisement directed them to go to inquire about the land; that there they met the defendant, who, the following morning, started with Wineman and wife to Sutter county to inspect the land; that, after viewing it, he concluded to buy the property, and, returning to San Francisco, there closed the deal. He said that he had no recollection of ever meeting with Reynolds until after the sale of the land to him had been completed, and this meeting took place at the Lick House, in San Francisco. Subsequently he again met Reynolds, who said to him that he (Wineman), in buying the land from the defendant, had "bought no land—you bought an ocean," and that Reynolds further said to him:

> "If we could back out on that bargain we made with Mr. Jackson, he could save us $10,000, sell us the land cheaper, $10,000 cheaper. * * * Mr. Reynolds did not at any time ever mention this land to me before I went up to Sutter county to see it with Jackson."

[1, 2] Thus there has been given a sufficient statement of the evidence introduced by the defendant to show that there was, so far as this court can determine, sufficient justification for the finding that the plaintiff's assignor and the defendant did not enter into the contract of copartnership described in the complaint, but that they did make an agreement concerning the sale of said land at the time the alleged copartnership is alleged to have been formed and entered into by and between them, but that the plaintiff failed to carry out his part of said agreement, and was therefore not entitled to share with the defendant in the profits on the sale made by the latter.

[3] It may be true, as counsel for the plaintiff undertake to point out, that the defendant's testimony is characterized by certain discrepancies or inconsistencies, but these were matters for the trial court to consider in connection with its consideration of the defendant's entire testimony and his demeanor while testifying. If, as appears to be true, the trial court believed and credited his testimony in the main, then it is not for this court to say that the discrepancies in his testimony, if in reality any there were, should be held to be of sufficient force or significance, by way of impeachment, to have required the court, which heard and saw him testify, to repudiate or disregard his testimony in toto. The proposition that an appellate court will not disturb findings based upon evidence wherein there is a substantial conflict has been so often stated and applied that its repetition would seem to be supererogatory. In this case, there being nothing inherently improbable in the testimony of the defendant, notwithstanding the asserted inconsistencies or contradictions pointed out therein, such a conflict does exist, and when we are asked to set aside findings which have been predicated upon testimony which may involve certain inconsistencies or contradictions, which in themselves do not necessarily render such testimony so intrinsically improbable as to justify us in declaring that it is, upon its face, wholly unbelievable, we are called upon to perform a duty which, in the very nature of things, a reviewing court cannot well be expected satisfactorily to discharge, viz., weighing and so determining the credit to be accorded testimony given viva voce before another tribunal. Even if it be true that the defendant became tangled or confused to some extent in his attempted explanations of the price he was to pay for certain lands, of the lands included in those constituting the tract sold to Wineman, and of the amount he was to pay Reynolds in case the latter himself sold or found a purchaser of the Borel tract, the fact remains that he unequivocally declared that there was no arrangement entered into between him and Reynolds, except the one found by the court to have been made, and it was within the legal province of the court to believe that statement as against the confusion into which he may seem to have been led as to the details referred to as well as against the counter statements of W. B. Reynolds and other witnesses of the plaintiff.

[4] It is next contended that there is no evidence to support that part of finding 2 which declares that the defendant agreed that, if the assignor of plaintiff found a purchaser of the land referred to in the complaint, he (defendant) would divide the "net commissions received by him." We think there is enough evidence in the record to have authorized the court to make that part of the finding. The defendant testified (page 120, Trans.) that he was told by Borel's secretary that the Borel tract could be bought for $6 per acre, and that he then figured on selling it at $10 per acre; that he proposed to Reynolds that, if he secured a purchaser for the land at the last mentioned figure, they would thereby make a profit of $2.50 per acre, or $1.25 each per acre. He said that, while he would, at the figures mentioned, receive for the land $4 per acre in excess of the sum paid for it, he would, however, be required to pay one-third of said excess to Umbsen & Co., and, besides, pay other necessary expenses incurred in negotiating the sale, such as the expense of an abstract and that of taking the parties to the land, etc. He testified (page 134, Trans.) that he figured that the sum he would be required to pay Umbsen & Co., and the expenses attending the consummation of the transaction, would total about $7.50, and thus there would be left, to be divided between himself and Reynolds, in case the latter sold or procured a purchaser for the tract, the sum of $2.50. There can hardly be any reason to say that the court was not justified in finding from this testimony that the agreement of the defendant was that he "would divide with plaintiff's assignor the net commissions (or profits) to be received by him from the sale," in the event that Reynolds procured a purchaser. Counsel, however, attempt to establish a distinction between the term "commissions" and the term "profits," and declare that the finding is not sustained, because the testimony shows that the division between Reynolds and the defendant was to be of the "profits" and not of "net commissions," as the finding states. But, while the two terms are not, in a commercial sense, strictly convertible, the one being more applicable to sales of merchandise and the other to sales of real estate, still in effect they mean one and the same thing in this case. What is unquestionably meant by both the finding and the testimony is that what remained out of the money received on the sale, over and above the cost of the land, and after expenses in negotiating it were deducted, should be equally divided between the parties, if Reynolds was the procuring cause of the sale.

[5] The last point made by the plaintiff is that the court failed to find on a material issue raised by the pleadings. This point arises from the omission by the court to make a specific finding upon the alleged fact that the defendant agreed to account to Reynolds for the profits realized from the sale of the land and to pay him one-half thereof.

But the obvious reply to that proposition is to be found in findings Nos. 2 and 3, the first of which necessarily implies that the defendant agreed to render to W. B. Reynolds an account of the profits on the sale of the land and to pay him his proportionate share thereof, while finding 3 rendered a finding on said issue wholly unnecessary. To be more explicit: While the court found that the copartnership, as alleged in the complaint, was not formed by and between the parties, it did find (finding 2) that, on the day upon which the alleged copartnership was established, the parties did enter into a convention of the nature of a broker's rather than of a partnership agreement, by the terms of which they were to share equally in the profits realized from the sale of the land referred to in the complaint, provided the plaintiff's assignor either sold or procured a purchaser of said land. Of course, the latter finding, as stated, of necessity implies a finding that the defendant agreed to account to W. B. Reynolds for the profits from the sale and to pay him his share thereof according to the terms of the agreement, if said Reynolds carried out his part of said agreement. In other words, such an agreement necessarily carried with it an agreement on the part of the defendant, without an express stipulation to that effect, to account to Reynolds for and pay to him his share of the profits, if he (Reynolds) executed his part of the contract, and therefore a finding that such an agreement was made necessarily carries with it a finding that the agreement by the defendant to account to Reynolds for the profits, etc., was made. But the court further found (finding 3) that Reynolds neither sold nor procured a purchaser of said land or of any part thereof; hence, since, under that finding, no duty rested on the defendant to account to Reynolds for the profits, etc., it became entirely unnecessary for the court to make a specific finding upon that issue, for, in view of the finding last referred to, a finding upon said issue would merely have amounted to a declaration that the defendant agreed to account to Reynolds for profits arising from a transaction in which he had no interest.

We perceive no importance, in its bearing upon the point last considered, in the discussion in the briefs of the question whether, as the plaintiff contends, a finding by the court, upon sufficient evidence, that an agreement other than a partnership agreement had been entered into between the parties, whereby they were to receive an equal share of the profits obtained from the sale of the land referred to in the complaint, would come within the fair and reasonable import or intendments of the averments of a partnership agreement contained in the complaint and the issues made. See Gorham v. Heiman, 90 Cal. 346, 358, 27 Pac. 289; McArthur v. Blaisdell, 159 Cal. 604, 115 Pac. 52; Bedolla v. Williams, 15 Cal. App. 738, 115 Pac. 747. But, conceding the proposition to be important here, the reply to it is that, as shown, the court did find that an agreement of a different character from the one pleaded was entered into between the parties for the purpose of selling the land mentioned in the complaint and of dividing equally between them the profits arising from the sale of said land.

We think the record is free from error, and therefore the judgment and the order denying the plaintiff a new trial should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

1. Officers (§ 63*)—"Vacation of Office."

Though a city sealer and his deputies, restrained from discharging their duties, obeyed the injunction for 10 months, until the ordinance under which the sealer was appointed was in another case declared valid, their offices did not become vacant, under Pol. Code, § 996, subd. 7, declaring that an office becomes vacant when the officer ceases to discharge his duties for a period of three consecutive months.

2. Officers (§ 63*)—Vacation of Office—Surrender of Paraphernalia.

Where a city sealer was enjoined from performing his duties and the city informed him that it would no longer pay the rent of the office he occupied, his surrender of the paraphernalia of his office on the city's demand was not an abandonment of his office.

3. OFFICERS (§ 63*)—VACATION OF OFFICE—ABANDONMENT.

Where a city sealer was enjoined from performing his duties, and the city after announcing its refusal to pay his office rent, required him to turn over the paraphernalia of the office, a letter by the sealer, referring to the "reestablishment" of the office upon dissolution of the injunction, does not show an abandonment of the office; other portions of the instrument showing that he still claimed to be the incumbent of the office of city sealer.

Petition by J. W. McEvers for a writ of mandate against Thomas F. Boyle, as Auditor of the City and County of San Francisco. Writ issued.

Pemberton & Pemberton, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Harry G. McKannay, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an original application to this court for a writ of mandamus directed to the defendant, as auditor of the city and county of San Francisco, commanding him to issue to the petitioner warrants to pay his official salary as deputy sealer of weights and measures, and those of certain other deputies who had assigned to him their claims therefor.

It being necessary to take testimony on the matters at issue, a reference was made to John J. O'Toole, Esq., for that purpose, and with instructions to report findings and conclusions. This has been done, the referee's findings being in favor of the petitioner, and concluding that the writ of mandamus prayed for should issue.

The matter now being submitted to this court for decision, a careful examination of the testimony taken and the briefs filed convinces us that the referee's findings and conclusions are a correct determination of the matter in controversy; and we adopt as the opinion of this court the referee's opinion filed with his findings, and which is as follows:

"The above entitled matter being an original proceeding, and the following questions of fact —i. e., (1) Did the petitioner and his assignors abandon their offices; (2) are there funds in the treasury of the city and county of San Francisco applicable to the demands of petitioner and his assignors—having arisen, and the matter having been submitted to the undersigned as referee to determine said facts, and such evidence as the parties to this action desired to offer having been taken before the referee, the matter was submitted for his decision.

"From the testimony taken and the evidence introduced it appears that Charles G. Johnson was, during the month of November, 1911, and under and by virtue of an ordinance passed by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, appointed sealer of weights and measures for said city and county; he qualified as such during said month, and entered upon the discharge of his duties, and appointed petitioner herein his chief deputy, and certain of petitioner's assignors, deputy sealers, and one Rowe, stenographer, all according to the terms of the ordinance. The deputies and stenographer all qualified, and during the month of November, 1911, entered upon the discharge of their respective duties. An office was furnished to the sealer by the proper authorities and he was provided with certain paraphernalia and equipment necessary for the discharge of his official duties. Shortly after the appointment and qualification of the sealer and his deputies, an action was instituted in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, asking for an injunction restraining the sealer and his deputies from performing any official act under and pursuant to the ordinance authorizing their appointment, commanding the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to refrain from passing any demand or incurring any expense against the city pursuant to the provisions of the ordinance, and commanding the auditor not to audit, and the treasurer not to pay any claim against the treasury of the city and county for any expense incurred in carrying out or attempting to carry out any of the provisions of the act. A temporary restraining order was granted in this action, and on or about the 8th day of February, 1912, the court announced its decision to the effect that a writ of injunction should issue as prayed for. While the judgment in this action was appealed from, the appeal was never determined, but it is conceded that Scott v. Boyle, decided December 12, 1912, reported at 164 Cal. 321, 128 Pac. 941, determined that the ordinance in question was valid and that the appeal in the injunction case would have been determined against the plaintiffs in that action.

"From the date of the announcement of the decision in the injunction case, the sealer, his deputies and employés obeyed the injunction, in this that they performed no official act under the ordinance. On February 8, 1912, the sealer in a letter addressed to the mayor of the city and county asked that his deputies and employés be given a leave of absence without prejudice to their positions and without pay until the Supreme Court had passed upon the validity of the ordinance, and he himself offered to continue in his position without pay. On April 8, 1912, the supervisors of the city and county denied the request. On February 19, 1912, the board of supervisors by resolution directed its clerk to close the office which had been provided for the sealer, and to take possession of the paraphernalia. The passage of the resolution was communicated to the sealer, and on the 21st day of February, 1912, he packed and delivered to the representative of the board of supervisors, upon the demand of the latter the paraphernalia of the office. And on the same day the representative of the board notified the owner of the building in which the sealer's office was situated that the city would no longer pay rental for said office. Hereupon the sealer established himself at a new location, where his deputies and employés reported to him daily, and where they all, according to their uncontradicted testimony, at least made an attempt to perform some of the duties of the office, but according to their own testimony, most of their acts were unofficial. However, they took no other employment and received no compensation or salary from any other source. They filed their demands in due form monthly with the auditor. This continued from February 21, 1912, until December 31st of the same year.

[1] "Counsel for defendant contends that the facts show that the office held by the sealer and his deputies became vacant on May 21, 1912, pursuant to the provisions of section 996, Political Code, which provides that 'an office becomes vacant on the happening of either of the following events before the expiration of the term: * * * Sub. 7. His ceasing to discharge the duties of his office for the period of three consecutive months, except when prevented by sickness, or when absent from the state by permission of the Legislature,' counsel basing his argument on the fact that the sealer voluntarily surrendered all of the paraphernalia to the representative of the board of supervisors, and thereafter performed no official act. The referee is of the opinion that the argument is not sound; it is admitted that the sealer and his deputies and employés performed their duties as provided by the statute up to the time they were restrained from so doing by the injunction issued by the superior court; this injunction for all practical purposes remained in force until December 12, 1912, when the validity of the ordinance was determined by the Supreme Court in another action, but in reality the injunction was never dissolved and actually the sealer and his deputies were restrained from performing their duties until the date of their resignation. Under the circumstances, I am of the opinion that their acts, or rather their failure to act, does not bring them within the provisions of subdivision 7, § 996, Pol. Code. The ceasing to perform the duties, etc., must be a voluntary ceasing. One can well comprehend what would have been the result of any attempt on the part of the sealer or his employés to perform any of the duties of their respective offices while the injunction was in force; undoubtedly on their attempt being called to the attention of the court, the court would have placed them where the attempt could not be renewed, and thereby more effectively than by mere command prevented a repetition of the attempt. Therefore, as long as the injunction was in force, it was their duty to obey it, and their doing so cannot be said to be such a ceasing to perform their duties as would bring them within the provisions of the section. See Bergerow v. Parker, 4 Cal. App. 169 [87 Pac. 248] where it is said: 'The finding of the court that "the office became vacant and the plaintiff ceased to be such constable on the 15th day of October, 1900," is based upon the provision of section 996 (7) of the Political Code that an office becomes vacant by the "ceasing of the incumbent to discharge the duties of the office for the period of three consecutive months except when prevented by sickness, or when absent from the state by permission of the Legislature"; and it is urged that inasmuch as the appellant was continuously held in confinement at San Jose for a period of more than three consecutive months from the date of his arrest, he of necessity ceased to discharge the duties of his office during that period, and therefore at the expiration of three months from his arrest his office ipso facto became vacant. We are of the opinion, however, that this is not a proper construction to be given to this provision of the section, but that, in order to create a vacancy in the office, the cessation to discharge its duties for the designated period must be the voluntary act of the incumbent. The section provides for many of the contingencies upon which a vacancy will be created, and it will be noted that with the exception of the death of the incumbent each of these contingencies contemplates some proceeding against him, in which he will have an opportunity to controvert the ground on which the vacancy is claimed, or some act initiated by himself and voluntarily carried into effect. It is in harmony with the other provisions of the section that, in order to create a vacancy in the office, the cessation to discharge its duties for the period of three consecutive months must have been voluntary on his part, and we hold that such construction must be given to the provision.'

"See, also, Ward v. Marshall, 96 Cal. 155, 30 Pac. 1113, 31 Am. St. Rep. 198, where the court said: 'The fact that during the time of his suspension from office its duties were performed by a person properly appointed for that purpose, and that the county has paid him the salary, does not affect the right of plaintiff to recover. He was, without fault on his part, and against his consent, released from the performance of the duties of such office for the period named. Fitzsimmons v. City of Brooklyn, 102 N. Y. 536, 7 N. E. 787, 55 Am. Rep. 835; Andrews v. Portland, 79 Me. 485, 10 Atl. 458, 10 Am. St. Rep. 280.'

"See, also, Johnson v. Brooks, 139 Ga. 787, 78 S. E. 37, where the court said: 'Section 264, Civil Code, provides "that all offices in this state are vacated by abandoning the office and ceasing to perform its duties or either." This language of the Code means the willful and voluntary forsaking or relinquishment of the office, * * * and not a failure to discharge its duties by reason of the acquiescence in the validity of a statute until it is judicially declared to be nugatory.'

[2] "Counsel for defendant lays particular stress upon the fact that the sealer voluntarily surrendered the paraphernalia of his office. I am of the opinion that no particular importance is to be attached to this act. The sealer was restrained from making use of the paraphernalia, and the city had notified him that it would no longer pay rental for his office, and it is not at all unreasonable that he presumed that when the paraphernalia could be used, he could have obtained it.

[3] "Counsel for defendant also quotes in his brief portions of a letter from the sealer to the mayor relative to the bureau of weights and measures, referring to its 're-establishment.' I fail to see that this particular correspondence, or any of the correspondence which is in evidence, shows any intention to abandon the office or any ceasing to perform its duties other than had already taken place by reason of the injunction. The sealer uses the word 're-establishment' in his letter and counsel for defendant has argued from this that he considered the office abandoned. I cannot agree with him. Other portions of the letter show that such was not his intention, and, furthermore, the word 're-establishment' may have been used advisedly, for certainly the office was in need of re-establishment as soon as the injunction which had practically abolished it, would be dissolved.

[4, 5] "Counsel for defendant also argues that the failure of the sealer and his deputies to take up the duties of his office as soon as the decision in Scott v. Boyle was announced shows that he considered his office vacant. I am of the opinion that the argument is not sound. The judgment of the Supreme Court in the Scott Case did not become final until 30 days after its rendition (December 12, 1912); furthermore, the injunction against the sealer was still in force, and, still further, a failure to perform the duties of the office from December 12th to December 31st (the date of the resignation of the sealer) would not constitute a vacancy in the office, for the ceasing to perform the duties of the office must continue for three consecutive months. Counsel for defendant cites in support of his contention that a vacancy occurred in the office, People ex rel. McGarvey v. Hartwell, 67 Cal. 11, 6 Pac. 873. I am of the opinion that the case is not in point with the one at bar. In the case cited, the claimant could, at any time during the two years, have demanded his office, or at least made an attempt to perform its duties. In the case at bar the sealer and his deputies were restrained from performing their duties. In that case the court said: 'Public office is held upon the implied condition of diligently and faithfully executing the duties belonging to it; and a willful refusal to perform the duties works a forfeiture.' In the case at bar, it cannot be said that the refusal to perform the duties was willful, for the injunction prevented their performance. In view of the injunction, and in view of the fact that the sealer and his deputies at least made an effort to perform the duties of their respective offices, I am of the opinion that no vacancy occurred in the office, and that they held office until the date of their resignation.

[6] "The only other point to consider is, Are there funds in the treasury of the city and county applicable to the warrants which petitioner demands? The referee is of the opinion that for the purpose of this inquiry it is immaterial whether there are or not. The proceeding now before the court is a proceeding to compel the auditor to issue his warrant, and the only question pertinent to this inquiry is, Is the petitioner entitled to the warrant? If he is, it should be issued. See Ott Hardware Co. v. Davis, 165 Cal. 795, 799, 800, 134 Pac. 973.

[7] "But should the question as to whether there is a specific fund upon which these warrants can be drawn be a material one, I would have to determine that the fund exists. Some $8,000 was appropriated to pay the salaries and expenses of the sealer and his deputies. The evidence shows that this fund was not drawn upon, but that it was merged in the fund known as the general fund at the end of the fiscal year 1912. If the general fund has been enriched by this specific fund, it is to be presumed that this fund still exists and is applicable to the payment of the warrants in question.

"To conclude, the referee is of the opinion that his award should be in favor of the petitioner in both the questions of fact which were submitted to him, and findings and conclusions may be prepared accordingly."

It is therefore ordered that the peremptory writ of mandamus issue from this court to the defendant, as auditor of the city and county of San Francisco, commanding him to deliver to the petitioner warrants for the salary of himself and his assignors due on May 1, 1912, and on the first of each and every month thereafter to and including January 1, 1913, aggregating the sum of $6,212.

SCOTT v. BOYLE, Auditor. (Civ. 1457.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 22, 1914.)

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Petition by M. P. Scott for a writ of mandamus against Thomas F. Boyle, as auditor of the City and County of San Francisco. From an order granting the writ, respondent appeals. Affirmed.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Harry G. McKannay, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellant. Pemberton & Pemberton, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The parties in the above-entitled cause having stipulated that the appeals from the judgment and order rendered in said cause in favor of the respondent, M. P. Scott, presents questions identical with those presented in the case of No. 1431, McEvers v. Boyle, Auditor, etc., 144 Pac. 308, decided by this court on September 21, 1914; that the facts in both cases are in all respects the same; and that all briefs and arguments filed and made on the appeal from the judgment in favor of the petitioner and respondent, J. W. McEvers (being case No. 1431), may be considered as made and filed in the appeal from the judgment and order in favor of said respondent M. P. Scott: Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered upon the authority of the case of McEvers v. Boyle (No. 1431), and for the reasons stated in the opinion filed therein, that the order and judgment appealed from in the above-entitled cause be, and the same are hereby, affirmed.

STOFF v. ERKEN et al. (Civ. 1521.)

1. Husband and Wife (§ 36*)—Contracts—Validity.

Under Civ. Code, § 158, a husband or wife may enter into any transaction with the other, respecting property, which either might have made, if unmarried.

2. Contracts (§ 111*)—Legality of Object.

A contract settling disputed property rights between spouses, both of whom were seeking a divorce, made after the evidence was in and with the advice of counsel, is not void for fraud, or as an agreement to withdraw or abandon a defense to a suit for divorce, where it was also agreed that the case should be submitted to the court on the evidence, although the negotiations were made on the theory that the divorce would be granted to the husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Louis D. Stoff against Irma M. Erken and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Nagle and P. B. Nagle, both of San Francisco, for appellant. L. H. Brownstone, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action by the plaintiff, the assignor of Charles H. Erken, to foreclose a mortgage on real property. Judgment went in favor of the plaintiff, and this appeal is from that judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

There were two defenses interposed to the action: First, that the defendant was induced to sign the note and mortgage by reason of misrepresentations of Charles H. Erken; and, second, that defendant did not receive any consideration for the same. The only way in which it was sought to establish these defenses was by attacking the validity of a settlement of the property rights of the defendant and Charles H. Erken theretofore had in a divorce proceeding pending between them, in which settlement the real property involved in the present mortgage, although standing in the name of the defendant, was claimed by Charles H. Erken to be community property, but was abandoned to the defendant upon her executing the note and mortgage in suit. The validity of that settlement is the only question raised by the appellant in support of her appeal.

Prior to the commencement of the present action the defendant Irma M. Erken had filed a suit against her husband, Charles H. Erken, for a divorce, alleging several grounds. Erken answered, and also filed a cross-complaint, alleging cruelty and adultery. He also sought in a separate action, but which was tried with the action for divorce, to have the real property involved in the present suit, and which was standing of record in the name of his wife, declared to be community property. In due time an answer to the cross-complaint was filed and the case went to trial. Plaintiff had completed her case in chief, and the defendant had introduced considerable testimony to sustain the allegations of his answer and cross-complaint, when the trial of the case was halted by negotiations of settlement of the property rights of the parties. An agreement was reached and executed under the terms of which the real estate above referred to was agreed to be the property of the wife upon her executing to the husband the note and mortgage in suit. An epitome of the testimony on the subject is as follows:

Louis H. Brownstone, the attorney for Charles H. Erken in the divorce suit, testified as to the agreement of settlement between Erken and his wife. In his testimony he states that after the trial had been in progress two or three days, and during an adjournment, Mrs. Erken's attorney, Mr. Eisner, called on him and discussed the testimony already introduced; that he stated to Mr. Eisner that the real property involved would undoubtedly, under the evidence submitted in the case, be assigned to his client absolutely, the testimony as to the wife's adultery being conclusive; that Mr. Eisner practically admitted that such testimony was irrefutable. Continuing, this witness stated:

> "Mr. Eisner at that time tried to prevail on me to dismiss this charge of adultery, and permit Mrs. Erken to get a divorce on the ground of desertion, or some such ground as that; but we absolutely refused to do anything except to submit the case on the testimony as it then stood. I told Mr. Eisner that I was satisfied that if the case was submitted as it then stood, or even if it went further, there wasn't any question about the fact that the judge would grant the divorce on the ground of adultery."

Mr. Eisner also appeared as a witness and testified with regard to the settlement between Erken and his wife. He said:

> "The action was to be submitted on the testimony then in. The cross-complaint was on the ground of adultery. The cross-complainant had put in quite a bit of evidence to sustain the charge. * * * It was then agreed that the case was to be submitted, and, further, it was to be conceded by the cross-complainant that the property was the separate property of Mrs. Erken. The note and mortgage for $5,000 was to be signed by Mrs. Erken. Then Charles Erken was to get the decree of divorce. The case was to be submitted to the court to make its ruling. It was assumed, however, from the evidence then in, that the court could not rule otherwise than to give judgment to Charles H. Erken. * * * In the negotiations we asked for one-half the value of the property; we asked one-half in settlement. The cross-complainant, through Mr. Brownstone, refused to give one-half, and the matter was contested, and was in court for a long time. As a counter proposition, and after some negotiations, and after a number of meetings, Mr. Brownstone made the proposition for his client that they were willing to accept $5,000 and Mrs. Erken keep the property. * * * Mrs. Erken said, 'Yes.' In that conversation we spoke purely, as I recall it, about property rights."

[1, 2] Under section 158 of the Civil Code, a husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, respecting property, which either might, if unmarried. The contract in this case seems free from any taint affecting its validity. True, it has been repeatedly held that where an agreement between husband and wife is founded upon a consideration to withdraw or abandon a defense to a suit for divorce, or to do anything to facilitate procuring the same, it is illegal and void (Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 39 Pac. 801; Beard v. Beard, 65 Cal. 354, 4 Pac. 229); but those cases have no application to the facts in this case; nor do we find that by the agreement of settlement complained of any fraud was practiced upon the court before which the divorce suit was tried.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTOVER et al. v. BRIDGFORD et al.

(Civ. 1371.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 30, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 27, 1914.)

1. VENUE (§ 63*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—NOTICE OF MOTION—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 395, requiring actions not otherwise provided for to be tried in the county in which defendants or some of them reside, but providing that if none of the defendants reside in the state the action may be brought in any county which plaintiff may designate, and section 396, providing that if the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof the action may notwithstanding be tried therein, unless defendant at the time he answers or demurs files an affidavit of merits and demands in writing that the trial be had in the proper county, conceding that a notice of intention to move to change the place of trial on the ground that none of the defendants resided in the county in which the action was commenced, was insufficient, in that, this is not a ground for such a motion if none of the defendants reside in the state. This defect was cured by a further statement that the motion would be based on the demand and affidavit of merits which showed that the ground of the motion was that the moving defendants resided in a county in the state other than that in which the action was commenced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 104–108; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

2. VENUE (§ 84*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—NOTICE OF APPLICATION—WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

If a notice of a motion to change the place of trial on the ground that none of the defendants resided in the county in which the action was commenced was defective in that this is not a ground of such motion if none of the defendants reside in the state, this objection was waived by appearing and contesting the motion without raising the objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 146–148; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

3. VENUE (§ 66*)—CHARGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS—SUFFICIENCY.

While an affidavit of merits on a motion to change the place of trial averring that defendants have fully and fairly stated the matters of defense to their attorney and that such attorney has advised them that they have a good and legal defense is defective, an affidavit, which in addition to such averment and an averment that the attorney for the moving defendants took part as their legal adviser in the transactions between the parties concerning the subject-matter of the suit, and that his advice was based upon that knowledge, set forth in detail the facts of the case from which it appeared that defendants had a meritorious defense, was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 110–113; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTION AS TO JURISDICTION OF OFFICER.

Where an affidavit of merits on a motion to change the place of trial was sworn to before a notary public appointed for a county other than that in which the venue of the affidavit was laid, it would be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the notary administered the oath within his jurisdiction.

5. VENUE (§ 84*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS—WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

The defect, in an affidavit of merits on a motion to change the place of trial which was sworn to before a notary public of a county other than that in which the venue was laid, was waived where no objection was made in the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by William Westover and others against H. V. Bridgford and others. From an order changing the place of trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Walter G. Holmes and John J. Roche, both of San Francisco, for appellants. E. A. Bridgford, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order granting the motion of certain of the defendants for a change of the place of trial.

The action is one in claim and delivery; and, at the time it was commenced in the superior court in the city and county of San Francisco, several of the defendants resided in the county of Siskiyou, and others of them resided without the confines of the state of California. The defendants residing in the county of Siskiyou filed a demurrer to the complaint, accompanying it with an affidavit of merits, and the demand required by section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and gave notice of their intention to move for a change of the place of trial to the county where they resided. The motion was granted. Plaintiff makes four points for a reversal of the order granting the motion. We will take these up in the order made.

[1, 2] The notice of motion was based upon the ground that none of the defendants at the time of the filing of the complaint or since were residents of the city and county of San Francisco. Section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action like the present one must be tried in the county in which the defendants or some of them reside at the commencement of the action, and if none of the defendants reside in the state that the same may be tried in any county which the plaintiff may designate in his complaint. Plaintiff claims that in order to entitle the defendants to a change of venue, under the provisions of that section of the Code, they should have stated in their notice the particular provision on which they relied as the ground of their motion (Bohn v. Bohn, 164 Cal. 532, 129 Pac. 981); that the notice given being based on the ground that none of the defendants resided in the city and county of San Francisco is consistent with the fact that they all reside out of the state, in which event, under the terms of section 396, the action might be tried in any county the plaintiff should designate in its complaint. Conceding, for the sake of argument only, this point to be well taken, we think the defect is cured by the fact that the notice concludes with the statement that the motion will also be based on the demand and affidavit of merits, which documents show in full the ground upon which the motion will be made, namely, that the moving defendants reside in Siskiyou county. The notice is no more defective than if it had stated that the "motion would be based on the grounds specified in the demand and the affidavit which are served and filed herewith." In such case it seems clear that the notice would be sufficient. Certain it is that the papers served and filed in the proceeding afforded the plaintiff ample notice of the ground of the motion. But even if this were not so, the plaintiff, having appeared and contested the motion without raising this objection, must be deemed to have waived the claimed defect in the notice. Bohn v. Bohn, 164 Cal. 532–538, 129 Pac. 981.

[3] The original affidavit of merits was defective in that it averred that the defendants had fully and fairly stated the matters of defense to the cause of action alleged by plaintiffs to their attorney, and that said attorney had advised them that they had a good and legal defense on the merits to the cause of action set forth in the complaint. Nickerson v. California Raisin Co., 61 Cal. 268; Palmer & Rey v. Barclay, 92 Cal. 199, 28 Pac. 226. While the amended affidavit which was filed repeats the language of the original affidavit just referred to, nevertheless it is not, we think, subject to the objection that it does not appear therefrom that they are advised by their counsel that they have a meritorious defense based upon his knowledge of all the facts of the case. In one part of the amended affidavit it is averred that the attorney for the moving defendants took part as their legal advisor in all the transactions between the parties to this suit, concerning the subject-matter thereof, and that his advice in this matter was based upon that knowledge. This, perhaps, is equivalent to saying that the defendants had stated the facts of the case to their counsel; but, in addition to this, the affidavit also sets forth the facts of the case in detail, from which it is plain that, if the facts are true as averred, the defendants have a meritorious defense on the facts to plaintiffs' alleged cause of action. In other words, to repeat, defendants have averred the facts of the case, and left the question of whether or not they have a meritorious defense based thereon to the consideration of the court.

[4, 5] The venue of the amended affidavit of merits was laid in Siskiyou county, while it was sworn to before a notary public in the city and county of San Francisco. It is doubtless true that a notary is only authorized and empowered to administer oaths in the county for which he was appointed (Fairbanks, Morse & Co. v. Getchell, 13 Cal. App. 458, 110 Pac. 331); but we will presume, there being no showing to the contrary, that the officer complied with the law and administered the oath within his jurisdiction. Where there is a variance between the caption and the jurat of an affidavit, it will be presumed that the officer acted within his jurisdiction. 2 Cyc. 30; Teutonia Loan & Building Co. v. Turrell, 19 Ind. App. 469, 49 N. E. 852, 65 Am. St. Rep. 419; Goodnow v. Litchfield, 67 Iowa, 691, 25 N. W. 882; Goodnow v. Oakley, 68 Iowa, 25, 25 N. W. 912. Moreover, it appearing that there was no objection to the affidavit in the trial court, the defect therein must be deemed waived. By sufficient averments, the affidavits show that the moving defendants reside in the county of Siskiyou, and that the other defendants reside in British Columbia; in other words, that none of the defendants reside in the city and county of San Francisco. And therefore, under the provisions of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the defendants are entitled to have the case tried in Siskiyou county.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

(Civ. 1365.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 238*)—ABANDONMENT—NEW CONTRACT.

Where plaintiff's assignor, having a written contract to do the plastering of a building, threatened to abandon it, whereupon an oral agreement was made that plaintiff's assignor should continue the work as superintendent for defendants, and they would pay him the actual cost of the labor and materials used therein, a finding that such oral agreement superseded, and was not a modification of, the prior written agreement, and was therefore not within Civ. Code, § 1698, providing that a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise, was proper.

2. COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT (§ 6*) — CONSIDERATION.

Where a dispute arose between defendants and plaintiff's assignor over a written contract for plastering a building, and plaintiff's assignor threatened to abandon the contract, whereupon an oral agreement was entered into that he should continue the work as defendants' superintendent, the settlement of the dispute between the parties constituted a sufficient consideration for the substituted oral contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Action by the Credit Clearance Bureau against the George A. Hochbann Contracting Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for appellants. Edwin H. Williams and L. S. Melsted, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

The facts of this case are simple, and the questions of law are not difficult of solution. George A. Hochbann Contracting Company had a general contract for the construction of a certain building in San Francisco. This company entered into a subcontract in writing with G. W. Burke, the assignor of the plaintiff, under the terms of which Burke was to do the plastering work on the building. The points in the case involve the questions: (1) Whether or not the work on the subcontract was done under the written contract, or under an alleged oral contract; and (2) if under the oral contract, whether or not that contract was void for lack of consideration.

[1] As to the first of these contentions, it is sufficient to say that we have carefully read the record, and find ample evidence to sustain the finding that the work was done under an oral contract. As to the second point, we find no force in defendants' position that the oral contract, which was substituted for the former written contract, was without consideration, and hence void. It appears, according to the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, that Burke was proceeding very slowly with the work agreed to be done by him in the written agreement, and threatened to abandon the contract, claiming that the work had been misrepresented to him, in consequence of which he had undertaken the contract at too low a price. As a result of these differences Burke and the construction company ultimately entered into an oral agreement, whereby Burke was to continue the work as superintendent thereof, and the defendants were to pay him the actual cost of the labor and materials used therein, "and the contract was to be turned into a day's work job." The court having found, as it did, that the oral agreement was substituted in the place and stead of the old agreement, and that the latter was canceled, the oral agreement is not to be held to be a modification of the prior written agreement, and therefore ineffectual for that purpose under the terms of section 1698 of the Civil Code. Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 325, 95 Pac. 154, 159.

[2] Nor was the oral agreement void for lack of consideration; it being based, as disclosed by the evidence, "upon the existence and settlement of disputes between the parties." Pearsall v. Henry, supra. The court found on all the material allegations framed by the pleadings.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

3. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER (§ 24*)—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint averring that, while plaintiff was in peaceable possession of a storeroom, defendants forcibly entered and ejected plaintiff, breaking the doors, locks, and windows, is insufficient to state a cause of action of forcible entry, it not showing the defendants retained possession; the purpose of the action, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1174, being to recover possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-111, 114-120, 146; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action for forcible entry by Henrietta Davies against John Stark and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant H. L. Suydam appeals. Reversed.

M. O. Graves, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Birney Donnell, of Los Angeles (Willoughby Rodman, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action for forcible entry. The complaint alleges that plaintiff, on October 31, 1913, was in the peaceable possession of a certain storeroom, at which time defendants forcibly entered therein, and in a forcible manner ejected the plaintiff from the premises, and broke the doors, locks, and windows of said storeroom, all to her damage in the sum of $500; that the monthly rental value of the property is $40. There is an absence of any allegation that any of the defendants detained possession of the property; indeed, from all that appears to the contrary in the complaint, plaintiff may have, immediately upon the commission of the acts attributed to defendants, resumed possession of the premises and held the same at the time of instituting the action. To this complaint Suydam, the appellant, filed a separate answer, admitting that plaintiff was, on October 31, 1913, in the peaceable possession of the property, but denied that he entered the premises in any manner, or ejected the plaintiff therefrom, or did any of the acts charged in the complaint to have been done by defendants. The court found the facts as alleged in the complaint, namely: That defendants forcibly broke the doors and locks of the storeroom, entered therein, and ejected plaintiff, who was in the peaceable possession thereof, all to her damage in the sum of $26.25, for treble the amount of which sum judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Suydam appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The record discloses that a bill of exceptions was prepared and settled, to be used in support of defendants' motion for a new trial, and also shows the motion as made to have been denied. This order must be affirmed, for the reason that the record does not disclose the grounds upon which the motion was made; hence it is impossible to say the court erred in the ruling.

[2] No attack is made upon the findings, and while the bill of exceptions discloses no evidence showing that plaintiff was damaged in any sum whatsoever, or that defendants detained possession of the property, we must, since the bill of exceptions does not purport to contain all of the evidence, but only such parts of the record upon which defendants based their claim for a new trial, indulge in the presumption that there was sufficient evidence adduced to justify the court in making the finding. Every presumption is in favor of the regularity of the judgment and proceedings upon which it is based, and to justify a reversal it devolves upon appellant to affirmatively show error.

[3] The only question to be reviewed upon the record as presented is the sufficiency of the complaint. As to this, we think what was said in the case of Bell v. Haun, 9 Cal. App. 41, 97 Pac. 1126, is determinative of the question. The facts in the case there were almost identical with those here presented. It was there said:

> "An allegation of forcible entry alone, unaccompanied by an allegation showing that defendant detains possession of the premises so forcibly entered, will not warrant an action under the provisions of chapter 4, title 3, Code of Civil Procedure, for forcible entry and detainer. Castro v. Tewksbury, 69 Cal. 562, 11 Pac. 339; Preston v. Kehoe, 10 Cal. 445; Armstrong v. Hendrick, 67 Mo. 542; Merrill v. Forbes, 23 Cal. 379. In the absence of such allegation a fact necessary to constitute the cause of action must be taken as having no existence. Hildreth v. Montecito Creek W. Co., 139 Cal. 22, 72 Pac. 395. While it appears from the complaint that plaintiff was in the actual and peaceable possession of the premises, and that defendants did wrongfully and unlawfully turn the plaintiff out of the possession thereof, it nowhere appears that defendants detained or withheld possession of the premises from plaintiff at the commencement of the action."

It is made the duty of the court, under section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, if the finding of the court be in favor of plaintiff, to enter judgment for the restitution of the premises; but to warrant such judgment it must appear from the complaint that defendants withheld the premises from plaintiff. It was further said in Bell v. Haun, supra:

> "The real gist of the action is the detention of the premises from the one entitled thereto, and this whether the detainer be forcible, as defined by section 1160 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or unlawful, within the meaning of section 1161, or the retention of possession without force and violence by one who has by force and violence entered upon the possession of another."

In 19 Cyc. p. 1156, it is said:

> "In all actions, brought under forcible entry and detainer statutes, it is necessary to allege a detention of the premises at the time of the institution of the action; for, in the absence of such detention the complaint would amount to no more than a trespass."

As frequently said, pleadings must be construed most strongly against the pleader, and, so regarded, the allegations of the complaint in this case are entirely consistent with the fact that defendants broke the doors and windows, ejected plaintiff from the storeroom, and immediately thereafter departed from the premises.

SACRAMENTO ORPHANAGE & CHILDREN'S HOME v. CHAMBERS, State Controller. (Civ. 1281.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 206*)—FEDERAL CONSTITUTION—"PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES" OF CITIZENS.

The "privileges and immunities" of citizens of the United States protected by Const. U. S. art. 14, § 1, providing that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, are those which arise out of the nature and essential character of the national government, the provisions of its Constitution, or its laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 205*)—RIGHTS OF CITIZENS—"PRIVILEGES"—"IMMUNITIES."

Pol. Code, § 2283, appropriates money from the state treasury to institutions conducted for the support of needy orphan children, and St. 1913, p. 629, amending such section, provides that no child whose parent or parents have not resided in the state for at least three years prior to the application for aid, or whose parent or parents have not become citizens of the state, shall be deemed a minor orphan within such chapter. Held, that such amendment, in so far as it withdrew aid from native-born citizen children of alien parents, was violative of Const. art. 1, § 21, providing that no citizen or class of citizens shall be granted privileges or immunities which on the same terms shall not be granted to all citizens; the words "privileges" and "immunities" being nearly synonymous, the term "privilege" signifying a peculiar advantage, exemption, or immunity, and the word "immunity" signifying an exemption or privilege.

3. ASYLUMS (§ 2*)—ORPHAN CHILDREN—CARE—STATE AID—"CHARITY."

State aid payable to institutions caring for orphan children, authorized by Pol. Code, § 2283, as amended by St. 1913, p. 629, is not a "charity," but should be considered in the light of the performance of a duty by the state to care for its citizens unable to care for themselves.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Charity.]

4. ASYLUMS (§ 2*)—STATE AID — ORPHAN CHILDREN—CARE—ALIEN PARENTS—MANDAMUS.

Pol. Code, § 2283, appropriates state aid to institutions caring for orphan children, and St. 1913, p. 629, amending it, declares that no child whose parent or parents had not resided in the state for at least three years prior to the application for aid, or whose parent or parents had not become citizens of the state, should be deemed a minor orphan within such law. Held that, where an institution cared for a native-born orphan child of alien parents, it was entitled to mandamus to compel the State Controller to extend aid for such child, either on the theory that the amendment should be construed not to apply to children of alien parents born within the state, or, if construed to cover such children, then as unconstitutional, leaving the act as it existed prior to amendment in force.

Application for a writ of mandamus by the Sacramento Orphanage & Children's Home against John S. Chambers, as State Controller. Writ granted.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, and Edward F. Moran and W. H. Barrows, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. John T. Nourse, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to secure the payment of a claim for the support of a minor orphan.

After setting forth that, from the 1st day of July, 1913, to the 22d day of May, 1914, the Sacramento Orphanage & Farm Association was a corporation, and an institution conducted for the support and maintenance of minor orphans, half orphans, and abandoned children, and that during the same period the Sacramento Children's Home was a like institution and conducted for like purposes, and that, on said May 22d, the said organizations duly consolidated and became vested with all the rights, duties, and powers of said component associations and succeeded to and became vested with all the property thereof, the petition proceeds:

"That for a period of six months immediately prior to the 31st day of December, 1913, that is to say, from the 1st day of July, 1913, to the 31st day of December, 1913, Sacramento Orphanage & Farm Association did have in its care, custody and control one Domeric Juryvich, a minor half orphan under the age of fourteen years, to wit, of the age of seven years or thereabouts. That the parents of said minor half orphan were aliens and had never become citizens of the United States or of the state of California. That the mother of said minor is dead. That the father of said minor, if alive, would have been a resident of the state of California for more than three years prior to the 1st day of July, 1913. That on August 25, 1912, the father of said minor left Sacramento to visit his native country, intending to return to the state of California. That petitioner is informed and believes that said father of said minor died on the journey to his native country. That said minor was born in the state of California and at the time of his birth his parents were residents of the state of California and continued to be residents of said state up to the time of their death."

Then follow allegations as to the proper presentation of petitioner's claim for $37.50 and its approval by the board of control, the availability of sufficient funds in the state treasury appropriated by the Legislature for the purpose of paying for the support and maintenance of said minor, and the application to respondent for the appropriate warrant and his refusal to draw the same.

The statutory authority upon which petitioner relies is found in section 2283 of the Political Code as amended in 1913 (Stats. of 1913, p. 629), as follows:

> "There is hereby appropriated out of any money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, to each and every institution in the state conducted for the support and maintenance of needy minor orphans, half orphans, or abandoned children, and to each and every county, city and county, city, or town maintaining such orphans, half orphans, or abandoned children, or any or all of such classes of persons, aid as follows: For each whole orphan supported and maintained in any such institution, not in excess of one hundred dollars per annum; and for each half orphan or abandoned child, not in excess of seventy-five dollars per annum."

Such legislation, it may be observed, does not rest its sanction alone upon the general authority of the legislative department of the state government, but it is expressly authorized by section 22, art. 4, of the state Constitution, as follows:

> "No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and upon warrants duly drawn thereon by the controller; and no money shall ever be appropriated or drawn from the state treasury for the purpose or benefit of any corporation, association, asylum, hospital or any other institution not under the exclusive management and control of the state as a state institution, nor shall any grant or donation of property ever be made thereto by the state; provided, that notwithstanding anything contained in this or any other section of the Constitution, the Legislature shall have the power to grant aid to institutions conducted for the support and maintenance of minor orphans, or half orphans, or abandoned children, or aged persons in indigent circumstances—such aid to be granted by a uniform rule, and proportioned to the number of inmates of such respective institutions; provided, further, that the state shall have at any time the right to inquire into the management of such institutions."

Since there is no issue as to the facts set out in the petition herein, there would therefore be no difficulty in the way of granting the relief sought were it not for the following provision of section 2289 of the Political Code, as amended by the said statutes of 1913:

> "In order that the provisions of this chapter shall not be abused, it is hereby declared: * * * (4) That no child whose parent or parents have not resided in this state for at least three years prior to the application for aid, or whose parent or parents have not become citizens of the state shall be deemed a minor orphan, half orphan or abandoned child within the intent and meaning of this chapter."

[1] Petitioner herein claims that this particular provision, if construed as contended for by respondent, is void as opposed to the Constitution of the United States and also the Constitution of this state. The sections to which petitioner refers are section 1 of article 14 of the former and section 21 of article 1 of the latter. But as to said provision in the federal Constitution, that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," the interpretation by the courts would preclude it from application to the situation here. In Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 382, 14 Sup. Ct. 571, 38 L. Ed. 485, it was said:

> "But the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, protected by the fourteenth amendment, are privileges and immunities arising out of the nature and essential character of the federal government, and granted or secured by the Constitution."

And in United States v. Moore (C. C.) 129 Fed. 632, it is declared:

> "The question is: Is the right or privilege claimed granted in terms by any provision in the Constitution, or so appropriate and necessary to the enjoyment of any right or privilege which the Constitution does specify and confer upon citizens of the United States as to arise by necessary implication."

The subject is also considered and discussed in the Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 21 L. Ed. 394; United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. Ed. 588; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; In re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 34 L. Ed. 519; and other decisions of the highest court of the country.

The Slaughter House Cases especially received the most deliberate consideration, and the court announced the rule to be that:

> "The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States are those which arise out of the nature and essential character of the national government, the provisions of its Constitution, or its laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof; and it is these which are placed under the protection of Congress by this clause of the fourteenth amendment."

Of course, it is difficult, if not impossible, to draw with precision a line which will separate all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States from those of the citizens of the state as such, but it is entirely clear that no provision of the Constitution of the United States forms the basis or affords legal sanction for the aid and assistance in question in this controversy. The privilege or benefit herein involved does not grow out of, nor does it have any relation whatever to, any grant of right or power by the federal Constitution. It is purely a state question involving only the construction of the said legislative enactment and of the fundamental law of this state. It is similar in principle to the provisions made for the education of the children of the state at public expense. As to that privilege it was said, through Chief Justice Wallace, in Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 405:

> "It will * * * be readily conceded that the privilege accorded to the youth of the state, by the law of the state, of attending the public schools maintained at the expense of the state, is not a privilege or immunity appertaining to a citizen of the United States as such; and it necessarily follows, therefore, that no person can lawfully demand admission as a pupil in any such school because of the mere status of citizenship."

This statement was directed to the contention of petitioner therein that by virtue of said fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution a citizen of the United States must be accorded the same privileges of admission to the public schools here as is granted to a citizen of this state. Other instances of special favors allowable to citizens of a state could be suggested, but sufficient has been said as to this branch of the case.

[2] But the contention of petitioner that said discrimination is obnoxious to section 21 of article 1 of the state Constitution is assuredly entitled to more serious consideration. That section provides:

> "No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted which may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the Legislature, nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens, be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens."

The child for whose support aid is herein sought is a citizen of this state. He was born in this state while his parents were residents thereof. It is undoubtedlly true, as stated by respondent, that:

> "Every child born here is a citizen of the state if its parents are residents of the state. Thus a child born here whether its parents are citizens or aliens immediately becomes a citizen of the United States, but its second citizenship follows the residence of its parents."

The child is and was an orphan under the age of 14 years and was cared for by such an institution as is contemplated by said statute providing for state aid. What is the basis, then, for discrimination between him and other citizens who are orphans under the age of 14 years and under the care of the same or of similar institutions? Is it any quality or condition affecting him personally, that would make such classification reasonable and just? Is there any "natural intrinsic or constitutional distinction" differentiating him from the other minor orphan citizens who are receiving and who are entitled to receive state aid? The answer, of course, must be in the negative. The distinguishing quality or condition relates, not to him, but to his parents. It would be a strange construction of the constitutional provision that would permit privileges to be conferred upon one citizen of the state and withheld from another for the reason that there was a difference in the political status of the parents. Mentally, morally, and physically, no doubt, the sins and infirmities of the parents are often visited upon their descendants; but in the realm of civil and political rights and privileges no such principle can be recognized or tolerated. To affirm the proposition contended for by respondent, that one citizen is, and another is not, entitled to this privilege in consequence of the difference in the citizenship and residence of their parents, is to deny all efficacy to the constitutional mandate that privileges and immunities must be granted to all citizens upon the same terms.

The purpose of the Legislature is unquestionably a commendable one, but it must be accomplished in a legal and constitutional manner. Restrictions affecting all citizens alike might be imposed which would prevent abuse of the privilege and which would be open to no valid objection.

If the condition of residence or of citizenship related to the minor orphan himself, it probably could be said that the classification was just and reasonable and within the purview of the Constitution. No doubt the Legislature might require the beneficiary to be a citizen of the state and a resident therein for a certain period. If he were not a citizen, said constitutional provision could not, of course, be invoked, and three years might not be an unreasonable requirement as to residence. There would thus be presented in the condition and status of the minor a just basis for valid discrimination. But that is entirely different from the requirement here as to the citizenship and residence of the parents. The injustice of the rule contended for could not be more impressively illustrated than in the present instance. If said provision as thus understood is to be enforced, no aid can ever be granted to said minor for the reason that death has rendered it impossible for either of his parents to become a citizen or resident for the requisite time. No such arbitrary and extraneous discrimination is sanctioned by our fundamental law.

In the foregoing, we have manifestly assumed that a "privilege" or "immunity" within the contemplation of said constitutional provision is involved in this controversy. However, as to this, there may be some ground for difference of opinion. The word "privilege," in common acceptation, means some immunity or advantage. Moore v. Fletcher, 16 Me. 63, 33 Am. Dec. 633. A "privilege" is a particular and peculiar benefit or advantage enjoyed by a person, company, or class beyond the common advantage of other citizens. Leader v. Cameron, 3 Okl. 677, 41 Pac. 635. In its natural meaning, the word "privilege" may be defined as a right peculiar to an individual or body. Ripley v. Knight, 123 Mass. 515. The words "privileges" and "immunities" are synonymous or nearly so; and privilege signifies a peculiar advantage, exemption, immunity, and immunity signifies exemption, privilege. Van Valkenburg v. Brown, 43 Cal. 43, 13 Am. Rep. 136.

Of course, it is not every special favor that may be regarded as a privilege or immunity in the sense of this constitutional provision, but the appropriation of public money would seem clearly to be within the letter and spirit of the expression used. The support and comforts of a home afforded the orphan by these benevolent institutions constitute a peculiar benefit or advantage to the recipients, as probably no one would deny. While the aid is not extended by the state directly to the orphan, half orphan, or abandoned child, it is for his benefit, and there can be no difference in principle because the money is appropriated to and used by the intermediary. The essential thing is that it is for the benefit of the dependent. To the extent of applying this money to the beneficent purpose of the law the institution becomes an agent of the state, and it may be said that the statute provides regulations and safeguards to guarantee the faithful discharge of the stewardship.

If it should be said that the terms "privileges and immunities" apply only to rights and benefits that are of constitutional origin, petitioner may still assert its claim on the ground that the duty of the state to aid these helpless minors is affirmed or, at least, recognized in the Constitution itself (section 22, art. 4), and the Legislature is expressly authorized to make the necessary appropriations.

With much plausibility, also, it might be contended that to give effect to the clause here in controversy as construed by respondent would be in violation of that mandate of said section 22, art. 4, that the aid extended to such institutions must be "granted by a uniform rule, and proportioned to the number of inmates of such respective institutions." It could hardly be said that this requirement is observed if some of the orphans or half orphans who are inmates of such institutions are excluded in making the appropriation.

There is, however, some contention made —worthy of brief notice—that the subject-matter in dispute involves a donation or charity and that a donation or charity is not within the constitutional inhibition. It is declared that:

> "The aid extended by sections 2283–2289 of the Political Code is not given in the exercise of any governmental function or constitutional mandate, but is merely a contribution to a private charity under the constitutional permission. No vested right attaches to the grant of aid. 'No pensioner has a vested right to his pension. Pensions are bounties of the government, which Congress has the right to give, withhold, distribute, or recall at its discretion.' United States v. Teller, 107 U. S. 68 [2 Sup. Ct. 39, 27 L. Ed. 352.]"

Even under this conception of the appropriation, however—whatever may be the rule as to the power of Congress or the authority of the Legislatures of other states—no such discrimination could be made by our Legislature in view of said constitutional prohibition. If it be regarded in the nature of a charity, it would be no less an invidious distinction made between citizens sustaining the same relation to the law.

[3] But the appropriation is not to be regarded in the light of a charity proceeding from merely generous or equitable considerations such as might move a kindly disposed individual to extend a helping hand to one in need of assistance. The modern trend and development of civic ideas is no more emphatically shown than in the unmistakable recognition and expression by statutory and constitutional provisions of the duty of the state to afford assistance and support to the citizens who are not able to support themselves. Whatever may be the condition in other and less advanced countries, the health, comfort, and security of the individual as well as the protection of his property are justly regarded here as proper subjects of legislative promotion. It is the state's duty as the representative of the strong to bear and relieve "the infirmities of the weak." This task cannot be relegated entirely to individual philanthropy. There is no place in our sociology or scheme of government for the brutal philosophy of Nietzsche that "the weak and helpless must go to the wall; and we shall help them to go." The state may honor and glorify the strong and powerful, but it recognizes its duty to assist and champion the weak and helpless. This is rightly considered, not as a benevolent gift, but the fulfillment of a legal and moral obligation growing out of the duties and privileges of citizenship.

It would seem that the only debatable question is whether said provision of the act can be construed so as to harmonize with the Constitution, or, if not, whether with the provision eliminated there is any legislative authority left for this appropriation. The duty of the court is, of course, plain and well settled, to sustain, if possible, any enactment of the Legislature, and, if compelled to declare any portion of an act invalid, to save the balance if it can be done.

"Constitutions, like statutes and private instruments, must be so construed, if possible, as to give some force and effect to each of their provisions. The legal intendment is that each and every clause has been inserted for some useful purpose, and when rightly understood may have some practical operation. For the purpose of harmonizing apparently conflicting clauses, each must be read with direct reference to every other which relates to the same subject, and so read, if possible, as to avoid repugnancy, and, to that end, sections, paragraphs, and sentences may be transposed; elegance of composition may be sacrificed; and the meaning of words and phrases may be restricted or enlarged." French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal. 540.

It is urged by petitioner that if we apply this principle and regard the whole of the act and the evident purpose of the Legislature, keeping in mind that an attempt to observe the requirement of the Constitution must be presumed, we should read the clause as follows:

> "No child not born in this state whose parent or parents have not become citizens of this state or whose parent or parents have not resided here for three years shall be deemed a minor orphan," etc.

As thus construed the law would it is claimed be reasonable and just and not obnoxious to said constitutional provision.

But we do not deem it necessary to decide whether this construction is permissible.

[4] We are satisfied that respondent's position cannot be maintained, and that one of the three following theories must be adopted, to wit: That the clause should be construed as advocated by petitioner, or that it should be held void and the remainder of the act upheld; or, if that be not possible, then the act in force prior to and at the time of the enactment of the said amendment should be considered as still operative. Upon any of these theories petitioner is entitled to prevail.

We think the peremptory writ should issue, and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

MILLIKEN v. MEYERS, City Auditor.
(Civ. 1570.)

1. Weights and Measures (§ 8*)—Officers—Validity of Appointment.

Where a city by ordinance appointed a deputy sealer of weights and measures and fixed his salary, it was immaterial whether he was appointed under St. 1911, p. 384, § 4, then in force, expressly authorizing the appointment of such officer, since in the absence thereof the ordinance would be a valid exercise of the police power conferred by Const. art. 11, § 11, providing that any city may make and enforce local police regulations not in conflict with general laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weights and Measures, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

2. Weights and Measures (§ 8*)—Pay of Officers—Constitutional and Statutory Provisions—"State Office"—"Municipal Affairs."

Const. art. 11, § 14, as amended October 10, 1911 (see St. 1911, p. 1798), authorizes the Legislature by general law to provide for inspection and measurement of commodities, and the appointment of necessary officers. St. 1913, p. 1086, enacted in pursuance thereof, in force August 10, 1913, provided general regulations for measures, by section 17 permitted any city to appoint deputy sealers of weights and measures at $5 per day, and by section 19 provided that the act should not affect any appointment previously made. The defendant city operated under a freeholders' charter adopted under Const. art. 11, § 8, which did not designate such officer, but authorized it to appoint officers not designated in the charter and fix their pay by ordinance, and it had previously appointed a deputy and fixed his salary. Held, that the delegation of power to appoint such officers was the same as though the charter had expressly provided therefor; that if he was a municipal officer his appointment and pay were "municipal affairs," whether the duties were imposed by the charter or by the general law; that if his services were to be performed on behalf of the state, the office was a "state office," notwithstanding the duties were restricted to the city, and the Legislature could not direct the appropriation of municipal funds for the payment of a state office—so that after the statute went into effect, he was not entitled to the pay fixed thereby, but only to that fixed by the ordinance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Mandamus by Joseph C. Milliken against John S. Meyers, auditor of the city of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Cryer and T. R. Spalding, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and Myron Westover, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This was a proceeding for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as city auditor of the city of Los Angeles, to audit a warrant in favor of plaintiff upon the treasurer of the city for the sum of $27.69, alleged to be a balance due plaintiff for services rendered during the month of August, 1913, as city deputy sealer of weights and measures. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment rendered in favor of defendant.

In order to properly understand the case, reference is had to various acts of the Legislature and provisions of the Constitution affecting the question. As the Constitution stood in relation to the matter prior to October, 1911, it provided that:

> "No state office shall be continued or created in any county, city, town, or other municipality, for the inspection, measurement, or graduation of any merchandise, manufacture, or commodity; but such county, city, town, or municipality may, when authorized by general law, appoint such officers." Section 14, art. 11, Const.

Pursuant to this authority, the Legislature adopted an act approved March 18, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 383), whereby, among other things, it provided that (section 4):

> "The respective counties, incorporated cities, incorporated towns and incorporated cities and counties of the state are hereby authorized to appoint sealers of weights and measures."

While this statute was in force the city of Los Angeles, which operates under a freeholders' charter, adopted an ordinance creating the office of sealer of weights and measures and provided for the appointment of deputies, and by ordinance adopted May 28, 1912, fixed the salary of one of such deputies, it being the position held by plaintiff, at the sum of $90 per month, in full compensation for all services rendered as such deputy or assistant sealer of weights and measures. Subsequently, on October 10, 1911, section 14, article 11 of the Constitution (see St. 1911, p. 1798), under and pursuant to which the act of the Legislature was adopted authorizing cities to create the office of sealer of weights and measures, was amended so as to read as follows:

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "The Legislature may by general and uniform laws provide for the inspection, measurement and graduation of merchandise, manufactured articles and commodities, and may provide for the appointment of such officers as may be necessary for such inspection, measurement and graduation."

Thereupon the Legislature, pursuant to this amended section of the Constitution, passed an act, approved June 16, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1086), and designated as the "Weights and Measures Act," providing elaborate regulations for the government of the measurement and graduation of merchandise, commodities, and manufactured articles. This act created the office of state superintendent of weights and measures, and authorized him to appoint, upon the request of the counties of the state, deputies for such counties, the salary of each of whom, when actually employed, being fixed at $150 per month, to be paid by such counties. The act also made it the duty of the board of supervisors of each county to appoint a sealer of weights and measures for such county, the compensation of which sealer of weights and measures was fixed at $5 per day for each day actually employed in the service of the county, and provided that in case such board of supervisors should not, within 120 days after the approval of the act, appoint a sealer for such county, it must apply in writing to the state superintendent for the assignment of a deputy superintendent, who, upon such application, was required to make such assignment, and fixed the salary of such deputy so assigned by the superintendent to such county at $150 per month; it being further provided that a violation of any of the various provisions of the act should constitute a misdemeanor.

The provisions of the act here involved are contained in section 17 thereof, which provides:

> "The legislative body of any county, or city and county or of any city or town may appoint a sealer of weights and measures, fix his compensation and provide for the appointment by the sealer of such number of deputies as the said legislative bodies may deem necessary and expedient. Such sealer and deputies shall each receive as compensation the sum of five dollars per day for each day actually employed in the service of such county or city and county or city or town."

It is unnecessary to note the inconsistencies of this section with other provisions of the act, so far as it affects and provides for sealers in counties. While the act makes it mandatory upon the board of supervisors either to appoint a sealer or request the state superintendent to assign a deputy for service in such county, section 17, so far as cities are concerned, merely permits them so to do, it being provided that such city may appoint a sealer of weights and measures. It is not required so to do, and in case none be appointed, section 18 of the act provides that the jurisdiction of the county sealer or deputy state sealer assigned to such county shall extend over the entire territorial limits of the county. Section 19 of the act provides that:

> "This act shall not affect the appointment of any sealer of weights and measures heretofore appointed for any city, * * * but such sealers shall perform the duties of the office under the provisions of this act, and shall possess the same powers and duties as sealers appointed under the provisions of this act."

[1] As stated, plaintiff had, prior to this legislative act, under an ordinance duly passed by the city, been appointed deputy sealer of weights and measures for the city of Los Angeles and his salary fixed at $90 per month. Whether appointed under the act of the Legislature of 1911, or in the absence thereof, is immaterial, since it has been held that, even in the absence of such express provision, an ordinance providing for the appointment of such official would constitute a valid exercise of the police power conferred on municipalities by section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution. Scott v. Boyle, 164 Cal. 321, 128 Pac. 941.

[2] The weights and measures act, section 17 of which provides that such deputy shall receive as salary the sum of $5 per day, went into effect August 10, 1913, and the contention of plaintiff is that, while his salary was, under and by virtue of the city ordinance, fixed at $90 per month, such provision continued in force only to the time when the provisions of the statute became effective, to wit, August 10, 1913; that such provision of the statute superseded the ordinance and fixed his salary at $5 per day, the result of which, since he was entitled to salary at the rate of $90 per month up to the 10th of August and $5 per day for the balance of the month, entitled him to compensation for services performed during the month in the sum of $117.69, and having received $90, left a balance due him of $27.69.

The question thus squarely presented is whether or not plaintiff is entitled to compensation under such city ordinance or under and by virtue of the provisions of section 17 of the weights and measures act. As stated, Los Angeles operates under a freeholders' charter, provisions for the adoption of which, as well as the amendment thereof, are found in section 8, article 11, of the Constitution. The office of sealer of weights and measures is not one designated in the charter. By its terms, however, the city is empowered to provide for the election or appointment of officers other than those designated in the charter, and prescribe their duties and fix their compensation. Section 66 expressly provides that:

> "The city council shall by ordinance fix the salary of all other officers herein, or by ordinance hereafter created, whose salaries are not hereby fixed or otherwise provided for."

Appellant insists there must be an express delegation of control as to the powers exercised by the city in order that such exercise should constitute municipal affairs, within the meaning of the term as used in section 6, article 11, of the Constitution. Conceding this to be true, the charter in the clearest terms gives the city the power to fix the compensation of all municipal officers.

> "The compensation of a municipal officer is purely a municipal affair, * * * and the charter provisions upon that subject are exclusive and conclusive." Trefts v. McDougald, 15 Cal. App. 584, 115 Pac. 655.

See, also, Graham v. City of Fresno, 151 Cal. 465, 91 Pac. 147; Popper v. Broderick, 123 Cal. 456, 56 Pac. 53; Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 386, 58 Pac. 923; Elder v. McDougald, 145 Cal. 740, 79 Pac. 429. This is true whether the duties of the office are exacted by the charter or be imposed by the general law of the state. Matter of Dodge, 135 Cal. 512, 67 Pac. 973. If, therefore, the office, for the performance of the duties of which petitioner seeks compensation, be a municipal office, then he is entitled only to such salary as the city may, by ordinance, have provided. To hold that the Legislature possessed authority to enact laws fixing the compensation of such office to be paid out of the municipal funds would be conceding to such body the power to amend a freeholders' charter contrary to the provisions of section 8, article 11, of the Constitution.

If, on the other hand, the services rendered by petitioner were those required to be performed for and on behalf of the state, such fact would render the position a state office. And, notwithstanding the duties in performance are restricted to the city, they do not, merely by reason thereof, become municipal in character. Fleming v. Hance, 153 Cal. 162, 94 Pac. 620. As to the salary of such office, the Legislature cannot impose the payment thereof upon a city the organic law of which is a freeholders' charter.

> "The Legislature is not empowered to direct the appropriation of municipal funds for the payment of the salary or office expenses of one who is simply a county or township officer." Graham v. City of Fresno, 151 Cal. 465, 91 Pac. 147.
> "We are not aware that it has ever been held * * * that the Legislature has power to appropriate the funds of a municipality to the discharge of an obligation against the entire state, or to direct the payment of such funds for any other purpose than pertains to the municipality itself." Conlin v. Board of Supervisors, 114 Cal. 404, 46 Pac. 279, 33 L. R. A. 752.

In neither view of the case is petitioner entitled to compensation at the rate of $5 per day for each day actually employed in the service of such city, as provided in section 17 of the weights and measures act.

As we construe the act, it seeks to provide a uniform system for the regulation of the measurement and graduation of merchandise, manufactured articles and commodities sold and manufactured throughout the state, provides for the appointment of a state sealer of weights and measures, and makes it compulsory upon the board of supervisors of the various counties to appoint a sealer of weights and measures or apply to the state sealer to assign a deputy to such county, and delegates to the legislative bodies of the various cities of the state the power, the exercise of which is optional, to appoint a sealer of weights and measures for such city. While not compelled to make such appointment, they may do so, in which case, as provided by section 19 of the act, the officer in the performance of his duties is controlled by the weights and measures act, and any violations of the provisions of the law become misdemeanors to be prosecuted by state officials. The delegation to cities of such power, to be exercised at their discretion, is, as we construe the law, the same as though the charter had in express terms made provision therefor, and it becomes a municipal affair to the extent that the making of such appointment and the fixing of such official's compensation is a matter solely within the control and right of the municipality.

Judgment affirmed.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action commenced by plaintiff, as assignee of the Dundon Bridge & Construction Company, against the county of Marin, and arises out of a contract entered into between the said company and defendant for the construction of a bridge across the tidal channel separating Belvedere from Tiburon in said county. Two causes of action are set forth in the complaint: First, to recover the sum of $7,000, the contract price for the work described in the complaint. Second, to recover the reasonable value of the work done, not to exceed the sum of $7,000.

It is alleged in the first count of the complaint that plaintiff's assignor commenced the work on September 1, 1903, and prosecuted same "with due diligence, and thereafter duly performed said contract and all the terms and conditions thereof and fully completed the same on the 1st day of February, 1905." In the second count it is alleged that plaintiff's assignor, between the dates above named, performed certain labor and furnished certain materials in and about the construction of said bridge; "that said work in the performance of which said services were rendered and said materials furnished was completed on the 1st day of February, 1905; that said defendant and the public generally are now, and ever since the completion of said bridge have been, using and enjoying the same; that the reasonable value of said services so rendered and said materials so furnished, as aforesaid, was and is $11,000"; and judgment is prayed for the sum of $7,000, the amount fixed by the contract.

Defendant, in its answer, sets up the defense of nonperformance of the contract and specifies numerous particulars in respect of which it is alleged that it has been breached; that the county surveyor has recommended that the work be not accepted; and that the board of supervisors has never accepted said work as completed, nor has it accepted any part thereof. "Defendant denies that ever since the alleged completion of said bridge, or at any other time or at all, it has been using or enjoying the same. Defendant admits that the public generally are now and ever since the alleged completion of said bridge has been using said bridge, but denies that it has been enjoying the same." Denies that the reasonable value of the services rendered or materials furnished as alleged are of the value of $7,000 or any other sum.

The trial was had before a jury, and upon the submission of the case the court directed the jury to find upon the following special issues:

"(1) Did the Dundon Bridge & Construction Company honestly and in good faith endeavor to comply with the terms and conditions of said contract entered into between itself and the defendant in this case; and did said company complete said work substantially in accordance with the terms and conditions of said contract? (2) What is the reasonable value to the defendant of the work performed and materials furnished by said Dundon Bridge & Construction Company in constructing said drawbridge, pile foundation, concrete walls, filling, and sidewalks described in plaintiff's amended complaint?"

To the first question the jury answered, "No." To the second the response was, "$3,000." The jury also returned a general verdict as follows: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find for the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000."

In due time defendant moved the court to direct the clerk to enter judgment, in accordance with special finding No. 1, that plaintiff take nothing by his action and for defendant's costs of suit. Plaintiff also in due time moved the court for a new trial, and both motions were heard by the court at the same time. The court denied defendant's motion and directed the clerk "to enter judgment nunc pro tunc in accordance with the verdict rendered herein," and thereupon granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial. Defendant appeals from the order denying its motion for judgment on the special finding and also from the order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] When the order granting a new trial is general, it is the well-settled rule that such order will not be reversed unless it appears that the order itself was an abuse of discretion. Von Schroeder v. Spreckels, 147 Cal. 186, 81 Pac. 515; Estate of Everts, 163 Cal. 449, 452, 125 Pac. 1058. In Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 412, 413, 35 Pac. 1024, the court said:

> "The granting or denying of a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict (which was one of the plaintiff's grounds for his motion), where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, rests so fully in the discretion of the trial court that its action is conclusive upon this court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of such discretion; and it is immaterial whether the evidence is insufficient to sustain all or only a portion of the issues on which the judgment must depend."

We do not deem it necessary to quote from the testimony of the witnesses relating to the numerous particulars in respect of which defendant claims that the evidence shows a failure on the contractor's part to perform the work in the manner called for by the contract. There is a substantial conflict in the evidence respecting the completion of the contract and there is a like conflict in the evidence concerning nearly every one of the alleged departures from or violations of the contract in the particulars pointed out by defendant in its brief.

[3] Defendant places its chief reliance upon what it claims to be the doctrine in this state:

> "That the owner is entitled to have built in all essential particulars the structure he contracted for, and no other; second, that where there has been departures from the plans in substantial particulars, the court can have no occasion to estimate the deficiencies, and the contractor cannot recover on a quantum meruit."

In support of its contention defendant cites Clark v. Collier, 100 Cal. 256, 34 Pac. 677; Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 300, 38 Pac. 740; Golden Gate Lumber Co. v. Sahrbacher, 105 Cal. 117, 38 Pac. 635; Marchant v. Hayes, 117 Cal. 669, 49 Pac. 840; and Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 170, 65 Pac. 391.

Respondent relies upon the rule as found in 3 Page on Contracts, 1385:

> "The original common-law rule required a strict and literal performance as a condition precedent to recovery. The modern rule permits recovery without a strict and literal performance, if there has been a substantial performance, and the contractor has attempted in good faith to perform the contract. If a contract has been performed substantially and deviations from the contract have been made but not willfully and in bad faith, the parties so performing can recover the contract price less the amount of damages caused by such deviation."

The rule is very clearly laid down and the cases examined in Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 170, 65 Pac. 391. In that case the controversy was between the assignee of the original contractor and the owner, in an action on the contract and also in quantum meruit et valebat, where the contract was "wholly void," under the provisions of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, because not recorded. It was held that there could be no recovery because it appeared that "the variance between the work called for and the work done was substantial," citing Perry v. Quackenbush and Marchant v. Hayes, supra.

The jury, as we have seen, found that the contractor did not "honestly" nor "in good faith endeavor to comply with the terms and conditions of said contract"; and did not "complete said work substantially in accordance with the terms and conditions of said contract." Had this finding of the jury rested upon uncontroverted evidence, it would, in our opinion, have justified a judgment in defendant's favor, for all the cases enunciating the more modern rule require, as Mr. Page expresses it, that there should be "a substantial performance and that the contractor has attempted in good faith to perform the contract," precisely the thing which the jury found the contractor did not do in the present case. This finding, however, does not rest upon uncontroverted evidence, and the rule first above adverted to applies equally to "all or only a portion of the issues on which the judgment depends." Domico v. Casassa, supra. There was a substantial conflict upon most of the issues presented in the case, and we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in reaching the conclusion that there should be a new trial.

In denying defendant's motion for judgment in its favor on the first special finding, the court had the power to exercise its own judgment as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support such finding, and there being a substantial conflict in the evidence addressed to the issues by that finding determined the rule applicable to the motion for a new trial is equally applicable to defendant's motion, and unless we can say that the court abused its discretion its action is conclusive upon this court. We cannot so say.

The orders are affirmed.

1. TENDER (§ 13*)—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1496, 1501, declaring that the thing to be delivered need not be actually produced, unless the offer is accepted, and that all objections to the mode of an offer of performance which the creditor could obviate by statement are waived, the tender of storage charges due on the property claimed by plaintiff is sufficient, though the money was not actually offered, where it was refused because defendants claimed other charges.

2. TENDER (§ 19*) — STATUTES — APPLICABILITY.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by William J. Sheller against S. Livingston and F. Deutsch, copartners doing business as the Western Machinery Company. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial granted.

J. K. Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Louis H. Brownstone, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action for claim and delivery brought to recover the possession of a certain gas engine with appurtenances. The property belonged to the plaintiff and one De Bretteville, as partners, doing business under the name and style of the American San Blast Company. In an action for the dissolution of that copartnership, the property in question was awarded to the plaintiff herein by the court. Prior thereto it had been delivered by De Bretteville to the defendants in this action, for storage at an agreed price of $5 a month. Defendants had sold and also rented certain goods to De Bretteville.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Subsequent to the award of the property to plaintiff in the action for the dissolution of the copartnership, and before the commencement of this action, a demand was made by plaintiff herein upon the defendants for its possession. At the time the demand was made, one of the defendants asserted a claim of lien in the property for the storage charges and also for the goods sold and rented to De Bretteville. Plaintiff offered to pay the amount of the storage charges, but refused to pay the amount claimed to be due for the goods so sold and rented. Defendants refused to deliver up the machinery under this offer, whereupon plaintiff sued defendants in claim and delivery, and the defendants in their answer and by way of counterclaim and cross-complaint set up a lien for the storage and for the goods sold and rented to De Bretteville.

The court below found against the defendants on all the issues tendered by them, except their claim of lien for storage, and found in favor of the plaintiff on all of said issues, but found for the defendants on the issue of tender made by the plaintiff to the defendants of the amount of the storage charges. Judgment was thereupon given for the defendants, plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is taken from that order.

[1] The only point therefore involved in this appeal is the question as to the sufficiency of the tender. The evidence upon which the finding was based is brought up on a bill of exceptions. The evidence is without conflict and shows that plaintiff and his counsel called upon defendants with the object in view of obtaining possession of the property, and offered to pay the amount of the storage charges. One of the defendants whom they met stated to them that his firm claimed a lien on the property, not only for the storage charges, but also for goods sold to De Bretteville, and stated that he desired to submit the matter to his attorney and would give an answer later. Subsequently plaintiff's attorney was advised by an agent of the defendants that he was instructed by defendants to inform plaintiff that they refused to deliver up the machinery under the proposal made by plaintiff, and had decided to hold it for the full amount of their claim.

Plaintiff, in offering to pay the storage charges, made no actual production in money of the amount due, and it is mainly for this reason that the sufficiency of the tender is questioned. It appears, however, from the evidence that the offer was not accepted by defendants, and no objection was made by him at the time that there was no actual production of the amount due as storage charges, nor does it appear that any demand was made that the money be produced. In the absence of such objection, the tender was a valid one. Sections 1496, 1501, Civ. Code; Latimer v. Capay Valley Land Co., 137 Cal. 286, 70 Pac. 82.

[2] The further contention of defendants that section 2074 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 1500 of the Civil Code provide the method of procedure to be followed in such a case is without merit. Section 1500 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

> "An obligation for the payment of money is extinguished by a due offer of payment, if the amount is immediately deposited in the name of the creditor, with some bank of deposit within this state, of good repute, and notice thereof is given to the creditor."

This section does not prescribe the mode of tender, but rather a method of extinguishing an obligation when that object is sought. Sayward v. Houghton, 119 Cal. 545, 51 Pac. 853, 52 Pac. 44.

[3] Section 2074 of the Code of Civil Procedure relates to an offer in writing to pay, and is a mere rule of evidence. Colton v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 137 Cal. 376, 383, 70 Pac. 225.

For the reasons given, the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is reversed, and a new trial is granted.

3. Criminal Law (§ 755½*)—Instructions—Facts.

In a prosecution for statutory rape by aiding and abetting a third person in its commission, a requested instruction, which would have impressed upon the jury the importance of the absence of proof that the prosecutrix made complaint of the assault immediately after it occurred, was properly refused, as involving an instruction on the facts.

4. Rape (§ 48*)—Evidence—Corroboration.

The fact that the prosecutrix in a case of rape might have made complaint of the assault to a third person immediately after it took place may be shown for the purpose only of corroborating her testimony of the assault.

6. Criminal Law (§ 755½*)—Province of Court—Instructions—Corroboration.

7. Criminal Law (§ 829*)—Requested Instruction—Given Instruction.

In a prosecution for rape by aiding and abetting its commission by a third party, the refusal to instruct that, in connection with the absence of proof that the prosecutrix complained to others of her treatment by the defendant immediately following the assault, the jury should consider the testimony of the doctors who professionally examined her sexual organs to determine whether there existed therein conditions indicating that she had been subjected to acts of sexual intercourse, was not prejudicial, where the jury were told to consider all the admitted evidence and to be governed entirely thereby in ascertaining the guilt or innocence of accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

8. Criminal Law (§ 785*)—Argumentative Instruction.

In such prosecution, a requested instruction that the jury should "scan the testimony of the prosecuting witness carefully to ascertain if she would be likely to have a design to warp her testimony to the prejudice of the defendant," was objectionable, as being argumentative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1774, 1776–1781, 1889–1894; Dec. Dig. § 785.*]

9. Criminal Law (§ 829*)—Requested Instructions—Given Instructions.

In such prosecution, the refusal to give such requested instruction was not erroneous, where the court so fully and clearly instructed as to the jury's duty with respect to the evidence that they could not have misapprehended their discretion as to the credibility and weight thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

10. Indictment and Information (§ 190*)—Offenses Included in Charge—Conviction of Attempt.

In view of Pen. Code, § 1159, providing that the jury may find defendant guilty of any offense necessarily included in that charged, or of an attempt to commit such offense, and section 663, authorizing conviction of one prosecuted for an attempt to commit a crime, even though the evidence may show that the crime attempted was committed by him, unless the court discharges the jury and directs his trial for the crime itself, defendant in a prosecution for statutory rape, where the jury on the evidence could have concluded that, rather than the crime itself, he was guilty of an attempt to commit it, might be convicted of such attempt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 596–603; Dec. Dig. § 190.*]

11. Criminal Law (§ 1160*)—Appeal—Conclusiveness of Finding—Misconduct of Juror.

The finding of the trial court upon defendant's affidavits, testimony, etc., that a juror whose misconduct was alleged as a ground for a new trial had not been guilty of such misconduct, was conclusive on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Geo. D. Murray, Judge.

Josephine Horn was convicted of an attempt to commit statutory rape, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial she appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, People v. Bartol (Cal. App.) 142 Pac. 510; People v. Hoosier (Cal. App.) 142 Pac. 514.

E. M. Frost, of Eureka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was charged by information with statutory rape, alleged to have been committed by one Orville Taggart, aided and abetted by her, upon the person of one May Bartol, in the county of Del Norte, on or about the 8th day of February, 1913, and the jury adjudged her guilty of an attempt to commit the crime so charged, and thereupon, as punishment for the crime, the court sentenced her to imprisonment for a term of four years in the state penitentiary. This appeal is by the defendant from the judgment and the order denying her a new trial.

The information charges that, on the day above named, the defendant "did then and there willfully and unlawfully and feloniously help, aid, assist, and abet, one Orville Taggart, in the perpetration and accomplishment of an act of sexual intercourse, then and there committed by the said Orville Taggart, with and upon one May Bartol, who was then and there a female under the age of 16 years, to wit, of the age of 11 years, and not then and there the wife of the said Orville Taggart," etc.

The trial was had in the superior court of Humboldt county, the cause having been removed to said county for trial on the motion of the defendant for a change of venue.

The first point advanced and earnestly urged by the defendant is that the evidence fell so far short of justifying the verdict that it becomes necessary for this court to now hold that, as a matter of law, it is wholly insufficient to support the conclusion of the jury as thus evidenced.

We are unable, after a full and painstaking examination of the record, to assent to that proposition. This case is one of a number growing out of substantially the same set of circumstances and of which two have hitherto been submitted to, heard, and decided by this court. See People v. Bartol, 142 Pac. 510, and People v. Hoosier, 142 Pac. 514. The facts brought out in this case are substantially the same as those developed in the above-mentioned cases, in both of which the evidence is given an extended review. It would involve what is conceived would be unnecessary repetition to reproduce herein in detail the testimony taken at the trial of the present case. It will be enough to say that the testimony in this case shows, as it was incidentally shown in the other cases named, that the defendant's part in the transaction was in deliberately holding the prosecutrix down while Taggart was engaged in the act either of accomplishing or of attempting to accomplish copulation with the child. For further and fuller details of the crime reference is made to the cases above referred to.

[1] In the Bartol and Hoosier Cases, supra, it was vigorously argued that the testimony of the prosecutrix and that of her brother (younger than she), upon which, largely, convictions were accomplished, was inherently untrue, because of certain inconsistencies and weaknesses appearing therein. We there held that, while there appeared in said testimony some discrepancies, it was a matter entirely within the legal competency of the jury to determine whether, notwithstanding such discrepancies, the testimony of those witnesses was, in the main, entitled to credit and sufficient to generate a conviction, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the guilt of the defendants. In this case, the same is said of the testimony of the same witnesses, and it may be conceded that said testimony is to some extent subject to the criticism so made. We can perceive no reason, however, for forming and entertaining any different view of the testimony of the prosecutrix and her brother in this case from that expressed by this court in the Bartol and Hoosier Cases. As stated, the story of the prosecutrix, implicating the defendant in this case in the crime which was perpetrated upon her, is practically the same as that given by her in the other cases, and it was peculiarly a function of the jury to decide the question whether the inconsistencies developed in her testimony were sufficient to impeach the integrity of her declaration that Taggart, aided and assisted by Josie Horn, committed an act of sexual intercourse with and upon her person at the time specified in the information.

[2] 2. It was proper, under the information, to allow evidence disclosing that the crime was committed on another day than that fixed in said pleading. The complaint is, in effect, that, because the information states that the offense charged was committed on the 8th day of February, 1913, and the proof shows that it was committed on the 13th day of said month, there is a fatal variance between the pleading and proof in that regard, or that a different crime from that alleged was proved.

The information declares, as seen, that the crime charged was committed "on or about the 8th day of February, 1913," and "before the filing of this information." Time is not of the essence of the crime of rape, and, under the allegations of the information as to time, it was competent for the people to show that the crime described in the information was committed on some other day than that specially named as the day in near proximity to which the criminal act occurred. Of course, where, in a rape case, it is claimed that several different felonious acts of sexual intercourse have taken place on as many different days between the defendant and the prosecutrix, it is the duty of the people in the prosecution of the defendant, to select some particular time at which such act was committed and address their proof to the establishment of the crime at such time. This course is necessary in order that the accused may be informed of the particular criminal act against which he will be required to defend himself, and it is the course pursued by the district attorney in this case. In fact, we do not understand that more than one act of intercourse is claimed to have been committed in this case.

3. The action of the court in the giving and the refusal to give certain instructions is assailed. The assignments under this head are so numerous that we feel compelled to refrain from attempting to give each special notice. Indeed, we do not think it is necessary to do so.

[3-6] A careful examination of the entire charge of the court has convinced us that thereby the jury were fully and correctly instructed upon all the principles of the law pertinent to the charge set forth in the information. Some of the instructions which were requested by the defendant and disallowed by the court in effect involved instructions upon the facts, and hence were properly refused. For example, it is claimed that the court committed serious error by rejecting the instruction, proposed by the defendant, which would, if given, have impressed upon the jury the importance of the absence of proof that the prosecutrix made complaint of the assault immediately after it occurred. The impression which a jury would likely receive from such an instruction would be that a conviction of the crime of rape could not be legally justified where there was no proof of immediate discovery to some third party by the prosecutrix of the fact of the assault upon her person; that is to say, that the guilt of the accused could not be established beyond a reasonable doubt in the absence of proof of that fact. Of course, such an impression of the law would be obviously unsound and untenable. The fact that the prosecutrix in a case of rape might have made complaint of the assault to a third person immediately after it took place may be shown for the purpose only of corroborating her testimony of the assault. The allowance of such testimony for that purpose is an exception to the general rule against the proof of self-serving declarations. But, although the prosecutrix in this case was in a measure corroborated by the testimony of her brother, Robert, it is not necessary, to justify and sustain a verdict of guilty of the crime of rape, that the prosecutrix should be corroborated, and whether there has or has not been such corroboration of any character in any case where the law does not expressly require it, is a matter upon which argument may be addressed by counsel to the jury, but upon which the court cannot instruct the jury without verging very closely upon the domain of fact.

The case of People v. Hamilton, 46 Cal. 540, cited by the defendant, does not hold that it is the duty of the court to read to the jury such an instruction as the one under consideration here. The reversal in that case was grounded upon the fact that the prosecutrix, under the age of 13 years when the alleged crime of rape was committed upon her, was the only witness to the alleged assault, and that her story was of such questionable verity as to have justly created a reasonable doubt in the minds of reasonable men of the defendant's guilt. She had testified that she made no outcry at the time of the assault or made the fact of the assault known to any person until two years after it was committed, that she suffered or complained of no bodily pain, and admitted that no flow of blood followed the alleged outrage. Under this testimony, the court said, and which was all that it decided in that case, that "it is almost inconceivable that a jury, free from passion or prejudice, would not, at least, have entertained a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant."

[7] 4. The court properly refused to allow the defendant's instruction No. 10, whereby the jury would have been told that it was their duty to consider, in connection with the absence of proof that the prosecutrix complained to others of her treatment by the defendant immediately following the assault, the testimony of the doctors who professionally examined the sexual organs of the prosecutrix for the purpose of determining whether there existed therein conditions indicating that she had been subjected to acts of sexual intercourse. The court, in its charge, instructed the jury that it was their duty to consider all the admitted evidence and to be governed entirely by that evidence in solving the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused, and even if the practice of pointing out and thus calling the jury's attention to particular evidence or the want of evidence on some particular point in the charge of the court to the jury were to be commended (and, as a rule, it certainly is not), the general instructions sufficiently covered the proposition sought to be given to the jury through the rejected instruction, and, therefore, in any event, its disallowance cannot be denominated as prejudicial error.

[8, 9] 5. The defendant's refused instruction No. 11 is not only argumentative, but would have instructed the jury that it was their duty to "scan the testimony of the prosecuting witness carefully to ascertain if she would be likely to have a design to warp her testimony to the prejudice of the defendant," and that they were at liberty to disregard her testimony. Argumentative instructions are not permissible and should never be given. As to the duty and right of the jury in the matter of disposing of the testimony of the prosecutrix or as to how they should act thereon, it is to be said that the court's charge contained such full, clear, and correct information upon the general subject of their duty with respect to the evidence that the jury could not have misapprehended the extent of their discretion in the matter of determining the credence and weight to which it was entitled. The instruction was properly disallowed.

The court refused and gave in modified form other instructions proposed by the defendant, and error in such action is assigned. We have examined these assignments carefully, and are upon such examination persuaded to say generally that, as to the instructions refused, they were either objectionable because they involved erroneous statements of the law or unnecessary because the principles therein stated were covered and fully declared in the general charge of the court. Nor do we perceive any error in the action of the court in modifying the instructions proposed by the defendant and, as so modified, given to the jury.

[10] 6. Objection is, however, seriously urged against the given instruction telling the jury that, under the evidence, they were authorized to find the defendant guilty of an attempt to commit rape. The defendant contends that such instruction was not only erroneous, but that the verdict cannot, as a matter of law, be upheld, because, so it is argued, the evidence, if it shows the commission of any crime at all, discloses that the crime of rape itself was committed, and that, where the proofs show that the crime of rape itself has been in fact committed, a verdict finding the accused guilty of an attempt to commit said crime is not sustainable.

In support of that proposition, counsel cite the case of State v. Mitchell, 54 Kan. 516, 38 Pac. 810. In that case, the defendant, who was charged with the crime of rape, was convicted of the crime of an attempt to commit rape upon the testimony alone of the prosecutrix, who positively testified that the defendant forcibly ravished her while they were traveling together in a buggy. The case was reversed for the reason, so it was stated, that the verdict was predicated upon the discredited testimony of the prosecutrix; the court saying, inter alia:

> "There is no other testimony in this case of any fact or circumstance, or of any act or declaration of the defendant, which is inconsistent with his entire innocence of any offense. The conviction therefore rests solely on the testimony of a witness whom the jury by their verdict have discredited and disbelieved as to the most important fact stated by her on the witness stand, and the fact concerning which, above all others, she could not possibly be mistaken. This court will not uphold a judgment resting for its only support on such a foundation. Section 418 of chapter 31 of the General Statutes of 1889, concerning crimes and punishments, provides: 'No person shall be convicted of an assault with intent to commit a crime, or of any other attempt to commit any offense, when it shall appear that the crime intended or the offense attempted was perpetrated by such person at the time of such assault, or in pursuance of such attempt.' If this witness told the truth, the section of the statute above quoted has been disregarded. If she was unworthy of belief, the jury should have acquitted altogether."

The above case is not in point here for two reasons, viz.: (1) The testimony of the doctors, so far as we are able to judge it, was sufficient to create considerable doubt —perhaps, a reasonable one—upon the question whether Taggart actually accomplished penetration of the private parts of the prosecutrix. Some doubt would also seem to have arisen from the testimony of the brother of the prosecuting witness as to whether actual penetration was accomplished. We may therefore assume that the jury, while convinced that Taggart, aided by the defendant, got the little girl down on the bed and pulled up her clothes and thereupon, with his pantaloons unbuttoned, got on top of her, entertained a reasonable doubt, from the testimony of the doctors and Robert Bartol, as to whether he succeeded in inserting his privates into those of the prosecutrix. In the Kansas case, supra, it will be kept in mind that there was no testimony showing or tending to show any other crime than that of rape. (2) Our Penal Code (section 1159), unlike and, indeed, the very reverse of the Kansas law upon the subject, provides:

> "The jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense."

And, under our law (section 663, Pen. Code), a person prosecuted for an attempt to commit a crime, may be convicted thereof, although the evidence may show that the crime intended or attempted was perpetrated by the accused in pursuance of such attempt, "unless the court, in its discretion, discharges the jury and directs such person to be tried" for the crime itself. This section is evidently the outgrowth of the well-conceived theory, the crystallization of which into practical application can manifestly result only in a convenient and at the same time just administration of the criminal law, that a charge of crime in an indictment or information necessarily includes the charge of an attempt to commit such crime and that evidence of its perpetration necessarily involves evidence of an attempt to perpetrate it, for it is not conceivable that any crime can be committed in the absence of an attempt to commit it. There must be a starting point in the actual commission of crime and obviously such starting point is the attempt. The actual commission of the crime is, in brief, the execution of the attempt. We can therefore perceive no sound reason for holding that the principle stated in section 663 of the Penal Code should not be as well applicable in a case where the charge is of the crime itself and thus a conviction of an attempt to commit it sustainable. But, as before suggested, it is certainly applicable in such a case where there is, as here, evidence from which the jury could have concluded that, rather than the crime itself, the accused has been guilty of an attempt to commit it.

[11] 7. It is lastly contended that the defendant's motion for a new trial should have been granted on the ground of the alleged misconduct of one of the jurors during the progress of the trial. The showing upon this point by the defendant tended to the establishment of the fact that Juror Sutherland had, while the trial of the cause was still in progress, and during the adjournments of the court, referred to the case in a conversation with one Colcord and on another occasion discussed with or expressed to one Sample his conception of the merits of the case and declared his intention of voting for a verdict of conviction. The juror filed a counter affidavit, in which he declared that he had no such conversations with Colcord and Sample as were testified to by them, and that at no time did he express any opinion upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant or state to Sample that he intended to vote to convict the accused. Other affidavits were filed in which the affiants deposed that the general reputation of Juror Sutherland for honesty, honor, and integrity in Humboldt county was of the very best.

Without discussing the question whether the verdict of a jury may be impeached in the manner attempted here, it is enough to say that there exists in the evidence a conflict upon the question whether the juror demeaned himself in the manner imputed to him by the affidavits and testimony presented by the defendant, and that the finding of the trial court in favor of the people upon that question is therefore binding upon this court.

We have now considered and noticed all the points pressed upon us for a reversal which, after a circumspect examination of the record, we have conceived to be entitled to special attention, and have thus encountered no just reason calling for a disturbance of the result reached by the jury or the action of the court in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The judgment and the order appealed from are, accordingly, affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 25, 1914.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 151*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO APPEAL—APPLICATION FOR LETTERS OF GUARDIANSHIP—"PERSON AGGRIEVED."

One who was nominated by a minor 17 years old as the guardian of the person and estate of the minor is "aggrieved" by the denial of his application, and may appeal therefrom, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, giving an appeal from such order.

2. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 19*)—APPOINTMENT—ELECTION OF NEW GUARDIAN BY WARD.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1750, providing that, when a guardian has been appointed for a minor under the age of 14 years, the minor may at any time, after arriving at that age, nominate his own guardian, subject to the approval of the court, when read in connection with sections 1748, 1749, providing for the original appointment of guardians for minors under 14 and over that age, a minor, for whom, while under 14, separate guardians of his person and estate had been appointed, may at 17 designate another guardian for both his estate and person, and the nominee must be appointed, if a suitable person.

3. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 16*)—APPOINTMENT—NECESSITY—PROPERTY.

Where it appears from the whole record that a minor has an interest in his mother's estate then under administration, although some of his statements might indicate that he had no property, he is shown to be possessed of property, so as to entitle one nominated by him as guardian of his estate to receive letters of guardianship.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Petition by Albert Laurence Johnson for appointment as guardian of the person and estate of George W. Goodyear Kirkman, a minor, opposed by Singleton Vaughn. Petition denied, and petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Crist, Johnson & Schuhl, of San Francisco, for appellant. C. J. Goodell and T. T. C. Gregory, both of San Francisco, and Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. One Vaughn was appointed guardian of the estate of George W. Goodyear Kirkman, a minor, when said minor was under the age of 14 years. At the same time a Mrs. Kirk was appointed guardian of his person. Four years thereafter, when the minor had attained the age of 17 years, Mrs. Kirk resigned as guardian of the person of the minor, and her resignation was accepted by the court and her accounts settled. The minor then nominated in writing Albert Laurence Johnson as the guardian of his person and estate, and Johnson presented to the superior court his petition for appointment as such guardian. After hearing, the court denied Johnson's petition in toto, and the latter appeals from the order of denial.

[1] There is no merit in the claim that Johnson is not a "party aggrieved," within the meaning of that term as the same is used in our statutes relative to appeals. He was an applicant for letters of guardianship, claiming, as matter of right, to be personally entitled to such letters by virtue of the nomination of a minor over 14 years of age, and the statute gives an appeal from an "order * * * refusing to grant * * * letters * * * of guardianship." Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3. We are not here concerned with the question whether or not the minor might also appeal.

[2] Section 1750 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "When a guardian has been appointed by the court for a minor under the age of fourteen years, the minor, at any time after he attains that age, may nominate his own guardian, subject to the approval of the court."

We are of the opinion that, when this section is read in connection with sections 1748 and 1749 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is clear that it means that a minor over 14 years of age has the absolute right to replace the guardian, appointed by the court when he was under 14 years of age, with one of his own selection, provided always that the person selected by him is, in the estimation of the court, a suitable or proper person. The latter sections prescribe the rules for an original application for letters of guardianship. If the minor is under the age of 14 years, the court may nominate and appoint his guardian. "If he is fourteen years of age, he may nominate his own guardian, who, if approved by the court, must be appointed accordingly." If the nominee of the minor over 14 years of age "is not approved by the court, * * * or if, after being duly cited by the court, he (the minor) neglects for ten days to nominate a suitable person, the court or judge may nominate and appoint the guardian in the same manner as if the minor were under the age of 14 years." Then follows section 1750, Code of Civil Procedure.

The whole scheme contemplates the absolute right of the minor to have a guardian of his own selection after he is 14 years of age, provided always he selects a person who is, in the judgment of the court, a suitable person to act as guardian. The discretion of the court can be exercised only in the determination of the question whether the nominee is a "suitable person." It does not follow from this conclusion, as suggested by learned counsel for respondent, that a minor over 14 years of age, once having exercised this right and procured the appointment of his nominee, may exercise it a second time.

[3] It is claimed that there was no necessity for the appointment of a guardian of the estate of the minor in that it was not shown that there was any property belonging to him. This appears to have been the basis of the action of the trial court in denying the application; the learned judge saying that there did not "seem to be any necessity for any guardian at this time further than the one already acting; there is no estate to handle." It sufficiently appears in the record that the minor has property, the same consisting of an interest in the property of his deceased mother's estate, which property is in the possession of the administrator of said estate; the same having been and being now in course of administration. One or two of the answers of the minor when examined as a witness, if taken alone, might indicate that there was no property, but, when his whole testimony is considered, it is obvious that what he meant by these answers was that his property was still in the hands of the administrator of his mother's estate, and that none of it had ever come into the possession of the guardian of his estate. If the minor is to have any guardian of his estate, authorized to receive any of his property from the administrator of his mother's estate, he is entitled to one of his own selection, provided he selects a suitable person.

If the order refusing to appoint Johnson as guardian of the estate of the minor was not erroneous, we would not be called upon to reverse the order of the superior court as to the guardianship of the person. The learned judge offered to appoint such a guardian, and appellant stated that he did not then insist on such appointment, thus waiving his claim in this regard. But, as the order denying the application for appointment of a guardian of the estate was erroneous, the order will be reversed in toto.

The order appealed from is reversed.

A mortgagor, being the owner of 10 acres of land and holding 20 other acres in trust for another, mortgaged the whole and then conveyed the 10 acres to his wife, subject to the mortgage. She had knowledge of the trust, and when the mortgage was executed, it was agreed between herself and her husband and the cestui que trust that the 20 acres should not be held liable under the mortgage as security for the debt. Held, that in equity the 10 acres were primarily liable for the mortgage debt and, the mortgagee's release of the 20 acres which were worth more than the entire mortgage debt was no defense to the subsequent enforcement of the mortgage against the 10 acres.

2. Mortgages (§ 302*)—Payment—Tender—Attorney's Fees.

Where a mortgage and the note secured by it both provided for the payment of attorney's fees in the event of legal proceedings, a tender, after suit brought, of principal, interest, and costs only, was insufficient.

3. Mortgages (§ 302*) — Foreclosure — Action—Pleadings—Attorney's Fees.

Code Civ. Proc. § 580, regulating the action of the court in granting judgment on a default, had no application to a suit to foreclose a mortgage in which a demurrer was filed and pending, so as to render sufficient a tender of the principal, interest, and costs, without the attorney's fees provided for in the note and mortgage, but for which there was no prayer in the complaint, on the theory that at the time of the tender plaintiff could not have recovered attorney's fees under the pleadings on a judgment by default.

Though plaintiff by praying for less than his due exposes himself to the risk, in case of default, of having to take judgment for limited relief, he does not, by the mere filing of his complaint, irrevocably surrender or release the balance of his demand, since the complaint is subject to amendment, and the answer may enlarge the scope of the relief to any extent consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 580.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Dan Cassinella against James H. Allen and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying the motion for new trial of defendant Luella F. Allen, she appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Dennett and J. M. Walthall, both of Modesto, for appellant. Griffin & Carlson and J. B. Jennings, of Modesto, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Action to foreclose a mortgage of real estate. The defendant Luella F. Allen appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

On September 15, 1900, the defendant James H. Allen made and delivered to C. H. Whitmore his promissory note for $300, payable three years after date, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, compounded annually. The note contained a promise to pay all legal expenses and attorney's fees incurred in the collection of the note. At the same time the maker executed, as security for the note, a mortgage of 30 acres of land in Stanislaus county. The mortgage provided for counsel fees of 20 per cent. of the amount found due, in the event of foreclosure.

On July 29, 1904, Whitmore transferred the note and mortgage to the plaintiff. The complaint, filed in September, 1904, after setting forth the note and mortgage in full, and plaintiff's ownership, alleged that nothing had been paid except interest to September 15, 1901, that the defendants, other than the maker, claimed an interest in the land, and that plaintiff had been compelled to employ an attorney, whose services were reasonably worth $76. The prayer was for $300, with interest, for the usual decree of foreclosure and for general relief. There was no specific prayer for counsel fees.

[1] The defendant Luella F. Allen demurred. The case remained in this situation for a number of years, that is, until November, 1911, when she filed an answer and cross-complaint. Her demurrer was then withdrawn. In her answer Luella F. Allen alleged that, prior to the commencement of the action, James H. Allen, the mortgagor, who was then her husband, had conveyed to her 10 acres of the mortgaged property. She alleged that she had tendered to plaintiff the full amount due on the mortgage, which plaintiff had refused, and, further, that after James H. Allen had conveyed to her, the plaintiff had released from the lien of the mortgage, without her consent, the remaining 20 acres, which were worth more than the entire mortgage debt.

With respect to these matters, the court found that at the time of the execution of the mortgage, James H. Allen was the owner of the 10 acres now claimed by Luella F. Allen, and that he thereafter conveyed same to her subject to said mortgage, which had been executed to secure the payment of the purchase price of said land. It was found that, when the mortgage was made, James H. Allen was not the owner of the remaining 20 acres, but held the same in trust for William J. Allen, who is now the owner thereof; that Luella F. Allen at all times had knowledge of said trust, and that it was agreed between James H. Allen, William J. Allen, and Luella F. Allen that said 20 acres should not be held liable under the mortgage as security for the payment of the note.

These findings, which find ample support in the evidence, furnish a complete answer to the contention that the plaintiff's right to enforce his mortgage against the 10 acres conveyed to Luella F. Allen was in any way affected by the release of the remainder of the mortgaged property. (It may be noted that the release in fact covered only 10 of the 20 acres not conveyed to Luella F. Allen.) Under the facts found, the 10 acres of the appellant were, in equity, primarily liable for the mortgage debt, and the court rightly concluded that they should be first sold, and that the 10 acres of William J. Allen still subject to the mortgage should be held only for any deficiency remaining after such first sale.

[2, 3] The evidence on the issue of tender was as follows: In December, 1904, the appellant's attorneys tendered to plaintiff's attorney the full amount of the principal and interest due, together with costs. This tender was refused because it did not include an offer to pay attorney's fees. At this time the appellant's demurrer was on file, but had not been disposed of. The note and mortgage both provided for the payment of attorney's fees in the event of legal proceedings, and the tender did not therefore include everything due the plaintiff. It is contended, however, that since the complaint contained no specific prayer for attorney's fees, and there was no answer on file, the relief which the court was authorized to grant could not, under section 580 of the Code of Civil Procedure, have included a judgment for attorney's fees. See Brooks v. Forington, 117 Cal. 219, 48 Pac. 1073. Therefore, argues the appellant, the tender covered everything to which the plaintiff was entitled, and it operated to extinguish the lien of the mortgage. But we think this conclusion does not follow. Section 580 regulates the action of the court in granting judgment upon a default. It limits the relief which may be awarded against a defendant who does not appear (Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 432, 448, 64 Pac. 692, 69 Pac. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153), and that is its sole purpose. It is of no importance, in the case before us, to consider the question, debated by counsel in their briefs, whether the word "answer," as used in section 580, is to be construed strictly or is to be given the broader meaning of a defensive pleading, either by answer or demurrer. Granting that there was here, at the time of the tender, no "answer" which would have justified a judgment for attorney's fees, we are not concerned with the judgment which might have been entered if the case had gone to default without any further pleading on the part of the defendant Luella F. Allen. In the first place, the demurrer was still pending. Until it was disposed of, no judgment could be rendered, and there was no room for the application of section 580. Furthermore, this section has nothing to do with the actual extent of the obligation due from the defendant to the plaintiff.

[4] Although the plaintiff, by praying for less than is his due, exposes himself to the risk, in case of default, of having to take judgment for a limited relief, he does not, by the mere filing of his complaint, irrevocably surrender or release the balance of his demand. The complaint is still subject to amendment, and it is also possible that the defendant, by answering, may enlarge the scope of the relief to any extent "consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue." Code Civ. Proc. § 580. If the defendant wishes to have the relief limited to that prayed for, he must allow the case to reach the status contemplated by section 580; i. e., that of an application for judgment by default, upon failure to answer. Until that point is reached the obligation which is the basis of the suit is not affected, and it cannot be extinguished by a tender which is not coextensive with it. As we have seen, the tender under discussion did not meet this requirement. It must therefore be held insufficient, even if it be assumed that a mere tender, not kept good, will suffice to release the lien of a mortgage.

[5] Prior to the date of the tender by her attorneys, the appellant had offered to pay the plaintiff one-third of the amount of the mortgage debt, together with one-third of the interest and costs then accrued. The plaintiff was clearly within his rights in refusing this tender, since, as we have seen, the land owned by Mrs. Allen was liable for the entire debt. In this connection it is contended that the lien was discharged by the partial tender, because, as is claimed, James H. Allen, in June, 1903, made a writing authorizing Whitmore, the then holder of the mortgage, to release the 10 acres of appellant upon her payment of one-third of the debt. This attempted ground of defense is fully met by pointing out that it is not suggested in the pleadings, and is therefore not embraced within the issues.

[6] Furthermore, the mortgagee was not bound by the request of the mortgagor in this matter. The contention that Cassinella holds the mortgage as trustee for James H. Allen and is for that reason concluded by the alleged request of the latter is based upon a view of the facts which is not sustained by the evidence.

[7] The only other point made that is worthy of notice is that the evidence does not support the finding of plaintiff's ownership of the note. The note, bearing the indorsement in blank of Whitmore, the payee, was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff. Plaintiff's attorney testified that he had bought the note of Whitmore for plaintiff, paying for the same with money furnished by plaintiff. This was enough to establish, prima facie, plaintiff's ownership. Bank of Cal. v. Mott I. W., 113 Cal. 409, 45 Pac. 674. The chain of title was not impaired by the fact that the instrument bore another indorsement, concerning which no proof was offered.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PLACERVILLE GOLD MINING CO. v. BEAL et al. (Sac. 2114.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 25, 1914.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 171*)—Review—Theory in Lower Court.

Where the allegations of a counterclaim in an action to foreclose a mortgage were treated by all the parties and by the court as being still in the case, notwithstanding the sustaining of a demurrer to the answer, such allegations would be treated as in the case on appeal.

2. Set-Off and Counterclaim (§ 29*)—Action on Other Transaction or Contract—"Cause of Action Arising out of the Transaction" — "Action Arising upon Contract"—"Connected with the Subject of the Action."

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, where no personal judgment was possible or was sought against one of the parties defendant, but only a decree adjudging its interest in the mortgaged property to be subject to the lien of the mortgage, such defendant's counterclaim for a certain amount for water furnished to plaintiff did not set forth a "cause of action arising out of the transaction," set forth in the complaint or "connected with the subject of the action," and as to such defendant plaintiff's action was not "an action arising upon contract," within Code Civ. Proc. § 438, requiring a counterclaim to be a cause of action arising out of the transaction or connected with the subject of the action, or in an action arising on contract, any other cause of action upon contract existing at the commencement of the action.

3. Set-Off and Counterclaim (§ 54*)—Waiver of Right to Object.

Where, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, one of the defendants, not a party to the mortgage, and against whom no personal judgment was claimed, interposed a counterclaim for water furnished to plaintiff, which counterclaim was not one permissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, the mere fact that plaintiff, while objecting to the counterclaim, consented that a certain amount thereof might be deducted from the mortgage debt did not constitute a waiver of the right to object to the counterclaim.

4. STIPULATIONS (§ 14*)—CONSTRUCTION AND EFFECT.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, one of the defendants, who was not a party to the mortgage and against whom no personal judgment was sought, filed a counterclaim for water furnished under a contract distinct from the mortgage. Plaintiff interposed an objection that the counterclaim was not permissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, but consented that a certain amount of the counterclaim should be deducted from the mortgage debt. Held that, since the only basis of defendant's recovery of the stipulated amount was plaintiff's consent, it was immaterial that interest was not added to such amount from the time the cause of action accrued thereon.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by the Placerville Gold Mining Company against C. N. Beal and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gavin McNab and George W. Mordecai, both of San Francisco (Clarence Coonan, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. George H. Thompson, of Placerville, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage. The mortgage was executed by defendant C. N. Beal to the El Dorado Water & Deep Gravel Mining Company, a corporation, hereinafter designated the El Dorado Company, to secure the payment of three notes in the sums of $40,000, $40,000 and $42,500, respectively. The mortgagee transferred all of its interest in the notes and mortgage to the plaintiff. Beal conveyed the mortgaged property to defendant Sierra Water Supply Company, hereinafter designated the Sierra Company, which, in turn, conveyed to the defendant San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Power Company, hereinafter designated the Power Company. The Power Company never assumed the payment of the mortgage debt. The two $40,000 notes were paid. The $42,500 note not having been paid, plaintiff commenced this action to foreclose against Beal, and the Sierra Company, the Power Company, and the Mechanics' Trust Company, of New Jersey. All the defendants, except Beal, were joined simply as holders under Beal subject to the mortgage, no relief being asked against any of them, except that such interest as it has be adjudged subject to the lien of the mortgage. A deficiency judgment was asked against Beal only.

The joint answer originally filed by the Sierra Company, the Power Company, and the Trust Company contained a further defense and counterclaim on the part of the Power Company only, for $1,989.75, for water furnished by the Sierra Company to plaintiff prior to March 11, 1912, the claim for which had been assigned to the Power Company; and also a further defense and counterclaim on the part of the Power Company only, for $1,012.50, for water furnished by the Power Company to plaintiff. Plaintiff demurred to the "answer" of the defendants, on the ground, among others, "that said answer does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense." The demurrer was sustained, and said defendants subsequently filed another joint answer which contained no counterclaim. The action was tried upon these pleadings, and judgment was given determining the amount due on the note, adjudging the interest of said three defendants to be subject to the lien of the mortgage, directing a sale of the premises to satisfy plaintiff's claim, and directing the entry of a deficiency judgment against Beal for the amount remaining unpaid, if any, after the sale of the property.

[1] Upon the trial, the allegations of the counterclaim were treated by all parties and by the court as being still in the case, notwithstanding the sustaining of the demurrer to the answer, the plaintiff admitting the allegations thereof, and the court finding thereon. We think they must be so treated here.

Said three defendants have appealed from the judgment; their sole claim on the appeal relating to the counterclaims of the Power Company for water furnished plaintiff. As to this, the lower court, instead of giving the Power Company a judgment against plaintiff, credited the amounts thereof, without interest, as payments on the mortgage debt, thereby reducing the same by the amounts thereof.

[2] It is contended, and the claim is not disputed by learned counsel for said defendants, that no personal judgment being possible or being sought against the Power Company, but only a decree adjudging its interest in the mortgaged property to be subject to the lien of the mortgage, the matter set forth in the attempted counterclaims was not the proper subject of a counterclaim, and that the Power Company was not entitled to obtain relief on account thereof in this action. We are satisfied that this claim is well based. So far as the Power Company was concerned, its causes of action set forth in the counterclaims did not arise out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, and were not connected with the subject of the action. Nor as to such defendants was plaintiff's action one upon contract. Section 438, Code Civ. Proc. Under such statutes as ours, a money demand upon the part of a subsequent grantee of a mortgagor, who has not assumed payment of the mortgage debt and against whom no personal judgment is asked, is not a proper counterclaim in an action to foreclose a mortgage. See Agate v. King, 17 Abb. Prac. (N. Y.) 159; Lipman v. J. A. I. Works, 128 N. Y. 58, 27 N. E. 975.

[3] Appellants' claim in this connection is based on the further claim that no objection was made to the counterclaims in the lower court, and that the objection is made for the first time on appeal. It is said that the authorities sustain the proposition that where a cross-complaint or a counterclaim will not properly lie, but nevertheless the same is treated as proper by the parties throughout the proceedings in the lower court, objection thereto may not be made in an appellate court. The lower court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, all other objections to the manner in which the issue was brought before the court will be deemed waived by the conduct of the parties. See Power v. Fairbanks, 146 Cal. 611, 80 Pac. 1075; Riverside Heights v. Trust Co., 148 Cal. 457, 469, 83 Pac. 1003. But the difficulty with appellants' position in this case is that neither plaintiff nor the lower court can be held to have treated the attempted counterclaims of the Power Company as proper counterclaims. There appears to have been no question as to the truth of the allegations contained therein, and plaintiff's attorney frankly admitted their truth, without putting the Power Company to the necessity of proving the same. Plaintiff was not required to interpose a demurrer to the counterclaims in order to preserve its objection. It could object thereto on the trial. Its admission of the truth of the matters alleged therein did not bar subsequent objection, and it did make timely objection by insisting that no judgment should be given in favor of the Power Company against plaintiff on its attempted counterclaims. Recognizing the justice of the Power Company's claim for compensation for the water furnished, it was willing to allow the claim to the extent of $3,002.25, as an offset to the mortgage debt, but it was unwilling to go further, and so distinctly stated on the trial. The learned judge of the trial court also treated the matters presented by the counterclaims as matters to be considered only with plaintiff's consent, finding as to each of the same that the amount thereof "is, by stipulation of the parties and admission of plaintiff entered into in open court, allowed as a further credit and part payment on the promissory note of $42,500, dated June 15, 1907, and mortgage in said plaintiff's complaint mentioned and set forth, * * * making in all, by reason of the allowance and admission by plaintiff of the two counterclaims of the said defendant San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Power Company, the further total sum of $3,012.25 to be credited on said promissory note and mortgage, in addition to the payments in said plaintiff's complaint set forth." It is urged that there is no foundation in the record for the conclusion of the trial judge that, in so far as the Power Company was concerned, there was any stipulation that the counterclaims might be treated simply as an offset on the mortgage debt, instead of the basis for a money judgment against plaintiff. We are of the opinion that, under all the circumstances, the record sufficiently shows a consent on the part of the Power Company's attorneys to support this conclusion of the trial court. While, in the first instance, the attorney representing the Power Company asked for a money judgment against plaintiff on the counterclaims, his demand was at once met by objections on the part of plaintiff's attorney, who stated clearly and explicitly what he was willing to do with respect thereto. Subsequently, when plaintiff's attorney again stated his claim as to the form of decree, the deduction of the amount of the counterclaims as a credit on the mortgage debt, and the amount remaining due on the mortgage debt, the trial court asked the Power Company's attorney if there was any objection. The only statement in reply was, "I do not know whether those figures are correct." The court replied that "that is a matter of detail," and the attorney replied, "A matter of calculation." Neither trial court nor counsel for plaintiff treated the matters alleged in the counterclaims as constituting proper counterclaims entitling the Power Company to a money judgment against plaintiff, and the allowance of the same at all in this action was a matter of grace and consent on the part of plaintiff.

[4] The point was made for the first time on the oral argument of this appeal, nothing having been said regarding it in either of appellants' briefs, that the judgment is erroneous in not allowing interest on the amount of the counterclaims, which would amount to about $165. Interest was asked in the prayer of the original answer, but on the trial, when plaintiff's attorney stated explicitly what he was willing to allow as an offset on the counterclaims, viz., $3,002.25, excluding all mention of interest, no objection was made by the attorney of the Power Company on that score, when asked by the court if there was any objection. In view of what we have said heretofore, the Power Company was entitled in this action only to what plaintiff was willing to allow in the matter of these counterclaims. We are satisfied that the decree should not be disturbed on account of the matter of interest.

[5] There is also an appeal by defendant

Beal from the judgment. No brief, however, has been filed in his behalf, nor was there any appearance on his behalf at the oral argument. Under these circumstances, we are not called upon to give any consideration to his appeal. It may be stated, however, that our examination of the record has disclosed no error in so far as he is concerned.

The judgment is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Petition by John E. Witherspoon, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Andrew Carothers, deceased, for an order for the final distribution in said estate. From an order directing distribution, W. B. Waldron and others appeal. Affirmed.

Snook & Church, of Oakland, and Wm. M. Sims, of San Francisco, for appellants. White & Miller and Devlin & Devlin, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and decree of final distribution in the estate of Andrew Carothers, deceased. There has been an appeal in this estate which involved the validity of a decree of partial distribution. Estate of Carothers, 161 Cal. 590, 119 Pac. 926. The said decree sought to distribute to Earl D. White a half interest in a small part of the realty of the Carothers estate, claimed by him under a deed to his predecessor from the widow of John Thomas Carothers. This court reversed the order and decree from which the appeal was taken and in its opinion interpreted the will of Andrew Carothers. It was held that a life estate in the realty was given to Eleanor Carothers and William P. Carothers, the wife and eldest son of decedent. The will contained the following words referring to the death of Mrs. Eleanor Carothers:

> "At her death said land with all the improvements and proceeds thereof vests absolutely in and is the property of said William P. Carothers, that in case said William P. Carothers dies without issue his property herein specified becomes the property of John Thomas Carothers, and at his death goes to Elizabeth Witherspoon."

It was held that these words created a defeasible fee in William P. Carothers, and that upon his death without issue, after the death of his stepmother (his brother John Thomas Carothers and his sister Elizabeth Witherspoon also having died), the heirs of Elizabeth Witherspoon were entitled to the real property. The question involved in that appeal was this: Did William P. Carothers take a fee simple absolute and indefeasible under the will of his father? This question was answered in the negative.

The petition for final distribution of the entire real property of the estate to the heirs of Elizabeth Witherspoon was duly filed, and those who appear as appellants here presented their answer to said petition, in which they asserted that Kate A. Carothers, widow of John Thomas Carothers, entitled to have distributed to her a half interest in the said land, had given her deed of trust to W. B. Waldron, trustee, as security for the payment of a promissory note executed by said Kate A. Carothers to Charles E. Snook and Wm. M. Sims. The answer contained averments that Andrew Carothers had intended by his will to devise his real property to Eleanor Carothers, his wife, and William P. Carothers, his son, to be held by them during the lifetime of Eleanor, and that at her death the title should vest absolutely in William P. Carothers; that, if William should die without issue during the lifetime of Eleanor, then the property, after Eleanor's death, should go to John Thomas Carothers for his life, and at his death to Elizabeth Witherspoon or her heirs; and that, in the event of William outliving Eleanor, all of the real property should become his absolutely. There were also allegations in the answer that William outlived Eleanor and took the fee to the realty, charged only with a lien to pay certain specific legacies. It will thus be seen that the contentions made by appellants on this appeal are exactly the same as those of the respondent which were rejected by this court in the appeal from the decree of partial distribution.

Appellants insist: (1) That the former decision is not the "law of the case"; (2) that all the evidence offered by them at the hearing of the contest was proper; and (3) that, under the offered evidence and the true rules of construing wills, the court should have interpreted the will of Andrew Carothers according to the contentions set forth in the answer. Upon the question of the "law of the case" appellants say that the rule should not apply to this appeal, because here the same parties are not concerned as those interested in the appeal from the decree of partial distribution, and because in the hearing of the contest of the proposed final distribution facts and circumstances surrounding the execution of the will were developed which were different from those adduced at the hearing on the petition for partial distribution. Respondents make answer to this point that in both distributions the title of the unsuccessful claimants depended upon the alleged interest of Kate A. Carothers, widow of John Thomas Carothers, and that, a binding and final interpretation of the will having been made on the former appeal, new facts developed at the hearing of the petition for final distribution could in no manner avail to change that interpretation. We think this position is correct.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] The interpretation of the will on the appeal from the decree of partial distribution was a determination of a question of law. All such interpretations must be decisions of the law, whether the court construes the will with or without resort to extrinsic facts. Estate of Donnellan, 164 Cal. 19, 127 Pac. 166. The construction of the will made by this court on the other appeal was rendered on an appeal in a proceeding in rem. William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 362, 48 Pac. 323.

[2] Kate A. Carothers was interested as a party, because she claimed an interest in the estate. The construction of the will made at that time was binding not only upon her grantee and his successor, but upon Kate A. Carothers herself. The appellants now before the court are also her grantees or successors to her supposed interest who took subsequent to the decision in the appeal from the decree of partial distribution. They had not only the constructive notice of that decision which all the world possessed, but two of them (who are the real parties in interest as creditors of Kate A. Carothers) had actual notice of all of the circumstances of the former appeal, because they were attorneys therein for Earl D. White. They occupy, therefore, no better position than that of Mrs. Carothers. She was bound by the former decision as "the law of the case." The decision on appeal from the decree of partial distribution is binding upon all of the parties in the matter of the construction to be given to the will. Hardy v. Mayhew, 158 Cal. 99, 110 Pac. 113, 139 Am. St. Rep. 73. The court of last resort having spoken in the matter of the interpretation of the will, the decree which the lower court was bound to enter under that construction must control, rather than the language of the will. Estate of Horman, 167 Cal. 475, 140 Pac. 11. Any other conclusion might lead to unjust results. Each appeal was made for the purpose of getting a ruling of this court upon the status of Mrs. Kate A. Carothers, under the will of her father-in-law, Andrew Carothers. In the former appeal, which was taken after a hearing at which, having notice, she was entitled to be heard, and at which the successor to a portion of the interest claimed by her actually did appear, it was declared by a majority of the court that the widow of John Thomas Carothers had no interest whatever in any of the realty of which Andrew Carothers died possessed. That was the necessary conclusion from the view taken by the majority of the justices regarding the proper interpretation of the will. It is and ought to be final upon the one vital question involved in both appeals.

The judgment and decree are affirmed.

DONOHOE v. ROGERS et al. (Sac. 2098.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1914.)

1. VENUE (§ 5*)—ACTIONS RELATING TO REAL PROPERTY — DETERMINATION OF CHARACTER OF ACTION.

Whether an action is one for the determination in some form of a right or interest in real property within Code Civ. Proc. § 392, requiring such actions to be tried in the county in which the subject-matter is situated must be determined from the allegations of the complaint and the character of the judgment which might be rendered against defendants upon their default.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 4–11; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. VENUE (§ 5*)—ACTIONS RELATING TO REAL PROPERTY—ACTION TO DECLARE TRUST.

A complaint alleged that plaintiff and R. entered into an agreement by which plaintiff was to devote his time to purchasing land with R.'s money and handling and disposing of the land, title to which was to be taken in R.'s name, who was to hold the land for the benefit of himself and plaintiff, the respective "interests" of the parties to be as therein stated. The agreement provided that from the proceeds of sales R. was to receive all money furnished by him, with interest, and the net profits were to be divided equally, that expenses and losses were to be borne equally, that the land was to be offered for sale on terms fixed by R., but that if plaintiff should not approve such terms, he should be given an opportunity to take the land and pay R. all his "interest" therein, together with profits on the proposed sale. The complaint further alleged that R. had conveyed land to a corporation which executed an agreement acknowledging that it held the land, and agreeing to hold it subject to the agreement between plaintiff and R., but that the corporation and R. denied that certain lands purchased pursuant to such contract were held by them under the conditions of such agreement, or that plaintiff had any right or interest therein. It prayed that it be adjudged that defendants held the legal title for the benefit of plaintiff and defendants under the terms and conditions of the contract, and that the rights of the parties be ascertained and adjudged. Held, that whether the contract between plaintiff and R. was one of partnership or one of employment, the action was one to declare a trust in real estate and was one for the determination, in some form, of a right or interest in real property, within Code Civ. Proc. § 392, requiring such actions to be tried in the county in which the subject of the action is situated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 4–11; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 104*)—ACTIONS BETWEEN PARTNERS—WHEN MAINTAINABLE.

Assuming that the agreement between plaintiff and R. created a partnership between them as to the profits and losses, the action was not within the rule prohibiting certain kinds of actions by one partner against another, based on claims growing out of the partnership transactions, such rule not preventing actions to have it determined that persons holding the legal title to land hold it in trust for the purposes of the partnership.

4. QUIETING TITLE (§ 10*)—SUFFICIENCY OF PLAINTIFF'S TITLE—EQUITABLE TITLE.

The action was not one to quiet title within the rule that such an action cannot be maintained by one having only an equitable interest against the holder of the legal title.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Charles L. Donohoe against W. J. Rogers and another. From an order refusing to change the place of trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walter H. Linforth and Linforth & Herrington, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Glenn county refusing to grant a motion of defendants for an order changing the place of trial of the action from the superior court of Glenn county to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco.

Defendants were entitled to have the action transferred to the city and county of San Francisco, the place of their residence, if it does not fall within the purview of section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, or section 392, Code of Civil Procedure. Whether it does or not is the question presented by this appeal.

Section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

"Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, * * * I. For the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination in any form, of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property."

The precise question here is whether the action is one for the determination, in any form, of an estate or interest in real property.

[1] Admittedly, the character of the action must be determined from the allegations of the complaint and from the character of the judgment which might be rendered against the defendants upon their default. See McFarland v. Martin, 144 Cal. 774, 78 Pac. 239.

The action was one to have it determined that the defendants hold the legal title to certain real property situate in Glenn county, for the benefit of plaintiff and defendants, under the terms and conditions of certain contracts set forth in the complaint.

[2] The allegations of the complaint are substantially as follows: On December 8, 1908, plaintiff and defendant Rogers entered into an agreement in writing. This agreement recited that Rogers desired to invest $40,000 in the purchase of lands in the Sacramento valley, and that whereas plaintiff was familiar with such lands and with the local situation and was widely acquainted in that section of the state, he could be of great assistance in the purchase of said lands. Rogers agreed to furnish $40,000 for such investment, the lands to be inspected and decided upon and agreed to by both parties before purchase. Plaintiff agreed to devote the necessary time to the selection of said lands, the obtaining of options, the rendition of any legal services that might be required in the purchase, handling, or disposition of the lands, and the looking after and management of the said lands to a certain specified extent while the same were held by Rogers, without other compensation than was provided in the agreement. It was mutually agreed "that the title to said lands shall be taken and vested in the name of W. J. Rogers," and that Rogers "shall hold said lands so taken in his name, for the benefit of himself and the second party hereto [plaintiff] as hereinafter stated, and the respective interests of both parties hereto in and to said land shall be as follows:" Rogers shall first receive from the proceeds of said land, whether as rental or from sales, all money furnished by him and 7 per cent. interest thereon, and the net profits received from rental or sale after such payment to Rogers shall be divided equally between the parties. All expenses connected with any lands so purchased, including taxes, shall be paid equally by the parties. Should a loss be sustained on any particular tract of land, the loss was to be "made up equally" by the parties. It was further agreed that after lands are purchased, they shall be placed on the market for sale, on such terms and for such prices as Rogers shall decide, provided that before any sale is made, Rogers shall submit the terms and conditions of the proposed sale to plaintiff for his approval, and in the event that he does not approve the same he shall have 90 days in which to take the land and pay Rogers all his "interest therein," together with the profits Rogers would make on said proposed sale. The agreement was to remain in force as to lands purchased until the same are finally disposed of.

On March 11, 1909, an agreement in writing was entered into between plaintiff and defendant Central Pacific, etc., Co., reciting the Rogers agreement, the purchase thereunder of certain land in Glenn county, and the taking of the title thereto in the name of Rogers for the benefit of himself and plaintiff pursuant to said agreement, and the conveyance by Rogers to said company of the legal title to said lands. The company acknowledged and agreed that it took and holds said land subject to the terms of the Rogers agreement with plaintiff.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It was further alleged in said complaint "that pursuant to said contracts" this land was purchased in the name of said Rogers, that the company holds the same subject to all the terms and conditions of said contracts, for the benefit of plaintiff and defendants, and that defendants deny that any of said land is held by defendants or either of them pursuant to or under any of the terms and conditions of said agreements or either of them, or that plaintiff has any right, title, or interest in said lands, and that they assert that they are not so held.

The prayer of the complaint is for a judgment that defendants hold the legal title to all of said property for the benefit of plaintiff and defendants under the terms and conditions of said contracts, and that the rights of the parties be ascertained and adjudged.

We do not see that it is necessary to determine in this action whether or not the agreement between Rogers and plaintiff created a partnership between them as to the profits and losses that might arise in the transactions contemplated thereby. Whether the agreement was one of partnership, or one of employment (see Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 Pac. 147) if real property purchased thereunder at once became and remains, while it is held unsold, incumbered in favor of plaintiff by the terms of the agreement, it would seem that the action here was one for the determination in some form of a right or interest in real property. Plaintiff's action is clearly one to obtain a judgment that defendants hold the land in trust for the purposes of the agreements. It is substantially alleged that the real property described in the complaint was purchased under and in pursuance of the agreement, and is so held. If this be true, although standing in the name of Rogers, the property has been set apart for the purposes of the agreement, and Rogers and his codefendant are not the absolute and unqualified owners thereof, but hold the same as trustees for the benefit of plaintiff and themselves. If so purchased, plaintiff has the right to have the property disposed of only in accord with the terms of the agreement, and to share in the proceeds in the manner specified therein. It is distinctly specified in the agreement that land so purchased shall be held for the benefit of plaintiff and Rogers, with a view to the disposition of the proceeds in the manner provided, and an "interest" on the part of plaintiff in the land is expressly contemplated. Plaintiff is given the right to purchase any of the land himself at the price for which Rogers may propose to sell the land to any one else.

It was substantially held in Green v. Brooks, 81 Cal. 328, 22 Pac. 849, that under the terms of a contract of similar character to the one here involved, where the person entitled to a portion of the net profits on the land was promised the same for certain services to be rendered in connection with the proposed acquirement of the land, such person was in effect one of the purchasers of the land, and that in equity he must he regarded as having such an interest in the land as entitled him to see to its proper disposition in accordance with the contract. This was said in response to the claim that such person had no "interest" in the real estate, but only a right to share in the profits. The action was one to declare a trust in land unsold, as well as to obtain an accounting for lands already sold, and it was held that the person holding the legal title "was properly held by the judgment of the court below as a trustee." We see no distinction material here between this case and the case at bar. The allegation that the land was purchased "pursuant to said contracts" sufficiently shows, for all present purposes, compliance by plaintiff with his part of the contract.

Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. 359, relied upon by defendants, was an action for the plaintiff's share of the profits provided for by a contract which had been realized by a sale of land acquired under the contract. The controversy was as to the profits claimed to have been realized. Conceding for the purposes of the appeal that the contract showed a partnership formed for the object of dealing in real estate, in response to a claim that the contract was void because not in writing, the court held that such a partnership could be formed by a contract resting in parol, saying that such a contract, "as between the parties * * * does not in any way affect the title to real estate, nor does the present controversy * * * involve any such question."

In Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 479, 30 Pac. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133, relied on by defendants, in reply to the defense of the statute of frauds, it was held that a partnership may be formed for the purpose of buying and selling land without a writing, that such a partnership may be formed in the same mode as any other partnership and that its existence may be established by the same character of evidence. But it was further substantially said in the opinion that, though such partnership agreement does not of itself create any interest or estate in land, yet by the subsequent acts of the parties, rights are acquired in reference to land purchased in pursuance of the agreement, which a court of equity will protect by raising an equity superior to the legal title and controlling the legal title in subordination thereto.

The language that we have quoted from section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, is very broad, and there can be no question as to its including an action to declare a trust in real estate, where land is the exclusive subject-matter of the litigation. See Booker v. Aitken, 140 Cal. 471, 74 Pac. 11; McFarland v.

Martin, 144 Cal. 771, 78 Pac. 239. The cases cited by defendants in this regard are all cases in which real and personal actions were joined, and it is well settled that a plaintiff cannot deprive a defendant of his right to a trial of a personal action in the county of his residence by uniting in his complaint a cause of action for the recovery of or the determination of an interest in real property.

[3] Assuming for the purposes of this decision that the agreement between Rogers and plaintiff created a partnership between them as to the profits and losses that might arise in transactions contemplated thereby, we know of no rule of law forbidding the action before us, an action simply to have it determined that certain persons holding the complete legal title to certain land hold it in trust for the purposes of the partnership. The rule prohibiting certain kinds of actions by one partner against another, based on claims growing out of the partnership transactions, does not go so far as to prohibit the action we have before us. In Traphagen v. Burt, 67 N. Y. 30, an action by a copartner to establish the character of certain realty as partnership property, and to compel a conveyance to him of his interest, where the property had been acquired in the name of the other partner, was sustained, the court saying:

> "There is no force in the objection urged that the action should have been for a dissolution of the firm and an accounting."

[4] This action is not one to quiet title and does not fall within the rule laid down in such cases as Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 77 Cal. 295, 19 Pac. 518. On the pleadings it is clearly an action to have it decreed that defendants hold certain property in trust for the benefit of plaintiff and themselves, as their respective rights are declared in certain contracts.

We find no other matter in the briefs that requires notice.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1914.)

1. Bailment (§ 14*)—Bailment for Hire—Lost Articles.

A cleaner, receiving clothes of a customer to be cleaned, is not under contract to search the clothes and preserve articles carelessly left in the pockets.

2. Bailment (§ 14*)—Clothes Cleaner—Care Required—Lost Articles.

That a clothes cleaner, assuming only a slight care in preserving articles which might be left in clothes sent to be cleaned, out of caution had appointed a searcher for lost articles did not make him an insurer, and so liable for jewelry found and stolen by an employé.

3. Bailment (§ 11*)—Voluntary Bailee—Clothes Cleaner—Lost Articles.

A clothes cleaner is not a voluntary bailee of jewelry left in clothing sent to be cleaned, which comes into the hands of employés without its consent or knowledge.

4. Master and Servant (§ 302*)—Torts of Servant—Scope of Employment.

The act of an employé of a clothes cleaner, a corporation, in stealing jewelry which he found in clothes sent to be cleaned, is a willful act not in the scope of his employment, and the corporation is not liable therefor.

Under Civ. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Mamie R. P. Copelin and James M. Copelin against the Berlin Dyeworks & Laundry Company, a corporation. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goldberg & Meily, H. L. Dearing, and George L. Greer, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Charles Lantz, W. J. Wood, and Davis, Lantz & Wood, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The action was one for $900, the value of a pair of earrings alleged to have been received by the defendant and converted by it to its own use. Defendant is engaged in the business of cleaning and dyeing clothes. Mrs. Copelin, one of the plaintiffs, sent a suit of clothes belonging to her husband, the other plaintiff, to the establishment of the defendant, for the purpose of having the garments cleaned. The suit was delivered to the driver of one of defendant's wagons. Next morning Mrs. Copelin telephoned to the defendant's office to learn if some bank books, which she believed she had forgotten to remove from one of the pockets of the suit, had been discovered. She was informed that the books had been found. Later, on the same day, she was called on the telephone by one of defendant's employés and asked if she had missed any jewelry. After consultation with her husband she remembered that he had pinned in the watch pocket of the trousers which she had sent to the cleaners, a small bag containing some of her rings and a pair of earrings worth $900. Both plaintiffs testified to Mr. Copelin's custom of carrying his wife's jewelry in this way. Both also testified that the defendant had returned to them the bag and the rings, but that they had never received the earrings.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Defendant introduced as witnesses the employés through whose hands the clothes had passed. The driver testified that he had received the clothes and delivered them at the laundry without examining the garments or taking anything from the pockets. The young woman who had searched for and found the bank books swore that she had found nothing else. She passed the suit to another young woman, who marked the garments for identification. The latter said she had neither searched for nor found anything in the pockets, but that she had passed the clothes to Mr. Gray, whose special duty it was to examine all clothing received by defendant, so that articles likely to damage the cloth during the process of cleaning might be removed. According to his testimony, Mr. Gray found the finger rings and nothing else. They were in a small bag, which was loose in the watch pocket of the trousers, not pinned in that pocket as plaintiffs testified it had been. There was a discrepancy in the testimony regarding the number of rings found. Gray said there were three, and plaintiffs insisted that there were four, but this variance is entirely immaterial on appeal, because plaintiffs admitted that all of the rings which had been left in the pocket had been returned to them.

The defendant insists that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court. Respondents, on the other hand, are of the opinion that the facts of the case bring it within the principles announced by section 2338 of the Civil Code. It appears from the testimony that because frequently articles were left in the pockets of clothes sent to defendant's establishment to be cleaned, dyed, or repaired, defendant employed a man whose special duty it was to search for such articles. Section 2338 of the Civil Code is as follows:

> "Unless required by or under the authority of law to employ that particular agent, a principal is responsible to third persons for the negligence of his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business, and for his willful omission to fulfill the obligations of the principal."

[1, 2] It is argued that according to the testimony of plaintiffs the bag containing the earrings was securely tied when it was sent to the cleaners; that, as Mr. Gray testified, it was securely tied when he took it from the pocket; that it had been constantly in the possession of the servants of defendant since leaving that of Mrs. Copelin; that even admitting the absence of liability for the loss of anything which might have dropped from the pockets and been so lost in the ordinary handling of the clothes prior to the search for the articles, the fact that the bag was tied precluded such theory; and that therefore the court was justified in assuming the abstraction to have been by one of the agents of the defendant in the transaction of his business and as a part of such transaction. The trouble with this theory is that a search of the clothing of customers and the preservation of articles carelessly left in pockets was no part of the contract between the customer and the cleaner. The defendant (whose duty was merely to clean the clothes of Mr. Copelin and to take slight care in preserving articles which might be left therein) had not assumed the functions of an insurer merely because it had, out of an abundance of caution, appointed a searcher for lost articles.

[3] The defendant was not a voluntary bailee of the jewelry of the plaintiffs which came into the custody of its servants without its consent or knowledge. Because one of those servants was charged with the duty of searching clothing, it cannot be said that defendant must pay for property left in the pocket of Mr. Copelin's garment and stolen by somebody.

[4] There was no jury, and the learned judge of the trial court did not find that any particular employé of defendant stole the earrings. In his written opinion he used the following language: "I am satisfied that some one in the employ of the defendant must have taken the earrings." To sustain the judgment, therefore, we would be compelled to hold that if any person intrusted with the handling of the suit of clothing stole the property left in a pocket, the defendant would be liable. The allegation of the complaint was that defendant, "being in the possession of the said earrings, unlawfully converted and disposed of the same to its own use," and the finding was that the allegations contained in the complaint were true. But it was not shown that the defendant ever personally, or by any of its officers, knew of the presence of the valuables in Mr. Copelin's clothing. Unless, therefore, the wrong of the servant was committed within the scope of his employment, the corporation was not bound.

Respondents cite such cases as Chamberlain v. Southern California Edison Co., 167 Cal. 503, 140 Pac. 26, where department 2 of this court adopted with approval the following statement of the rule as contained in 10 Cyc. 1205:

> "Under the rule of respondeat superior a corcorporation is civilly liable for torts committed by its servant or agent while acting within the scope of his employment, although the corporation neither authorized the doing of the particular act nor ratified it after it was done."

Unquestionably that is the general rule, and we pointed out the additional facts in the Chamberlain Case that the servant who caused the injury was operating the motor car under authority of his principal, and that the defendant ratified his act by repairing, for a consideration, the automobile which the servant was engaged in "towing" to its shop. In that case and in similar ones, there was no doubt about the offending servant acting within the scope of his authority. It is the duty of a servant to drive an automobile on the public street safely, and his negligence is imputable to his principal, who is bound to employ a skilled man for such work. But when a servant whose duty it is to collect, mark, or even search clothes steals valuables left therein without the wish or consent of his principal, he is not acting within the scope of his occupation. The liability of the master does not extend to willful or malicious acts of the servant done while engaged in the master's service, but independent of that service and for the servant's own benefit. And this is true even where the employment furnishes the opportunity for the wrongdoing.

In Walsh v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 47, 52 Pac. 115, 39 L. R. A. 697, this court was considering the act of an agent to whom an executed note and mortgage had been left for delivery. The agent altered the figures evidencing the principal sum and the rate of interest. It was held that while the forger was admittedly the agent of the defendant for certain purposes, he had no implied or ostensible authority conferred upon him to commit a forgery. So, here, the agency of the employés of the Berlin Dyeworks & Laundry Company in no instance extended permission to steal jewelry on behalf of that corporation. In Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 683, 76 Pac. 660, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154, it was held that an innkeeper was not liable for an assault and battery committed by a waiter in his dining room upon one of his guests. In the opinion, written by the late Chief Justice Beatty, the rule is thus stated:

> "By the general law of master and servant, the master is not liable for the malicious torts of the servant committed outside of the scope of his employment. The wrongful act must be one which the servant is empowered under some circumstances to do. It must be something which his employment contemplated, as, for instance, the ejection of a passenger or intruder from a railroad car. Conductors and brakemen have authority to eject disorderly passengers, or persons who refuse to pay their fare, and it is left to their discretion when such authority shall be exercised. In a proper case they may eject a passenger without incurring any liability themselves or imposing any liability upon their employer, but if they eject him wrongfully and maliciously, the carrier is liable upon the general ground that the act is one which, if lawfully done, could be done in the employer's name, and justified by his authorization. The law on this point is very clearly stated in Cooley on Torts (star pages 535 et seq.), and in none of the decisions of this court has a stricter rule been enforced than as above stated. Under that rule, the defendant cannot be held liable, because there is no finding and no reason to presume that defendant ever authorized his servants to assault his guests, or any other person, under any circumstances."

In Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., 93 Cal. 560, 29 Pac. 234, 15 L. R. A. 475, 27 Am. St. Rep. 223, it was held that defendant's engineer who, to frighten passengers on a street car which was in close proximity to defendant's track, backed his engine towards said street car, was not acting within the scope of his employment, and that defendant was not liable for the injury sustained by a passenger who leaped from the street car to avoid the apparent peril. Familiar examples of nonliability of a person for the torts of his servant committed outside of the scope of the latter's duty are found in the so-called "joy ride" cases wherein owners of automobiles have been held not liable for injuries inflicted by their servants while using the masters' motor cars without authority. We had occasion to cite the leading cases on this subject in Chamberlain v. Southern Cal. Edison Co., 167 Cal. 503, 140 Pac. 25. The same principle is applicable to the facts of this case.

[5] The defendant was not chargeable as an involuntary bailee. At common law one could not be made a bailee without his consent. 9 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 283. The Civil Code §§ 1815, 1816, modifies this rule by providing that "an involuntary deposit is made: By the accidental leaving or placing of personal property in the possession of any person, without negligence on the part of its owner," and that the involuntary depositary is bound to take charge of the property if able to do so. But the plaintiff, Mrs. Copelin was clearly negligent, and there was no evidence that defendant's servants were authorized or directed to accept, on behalf of their master, the care and custody of property left in the clothing which they might handle in the course of their employment. Even if we should concede the correctness of respondent's contention that defendant occupied the position of a gratuitous bailee, we should be compelled to hold that the corporation could not be held for the theft. The relation of master and servant does not appertain to the wrongful acts of the latter committed, outside the scope of his employment, upon the article so bailed. In Merchants' Nat. Bank of Savannah v. Guilmartin, 88 Ga. 798, 15 S. E. 831, 17 L. R. A. 322, it was held that a bank is not liable for the theft by its cashier of valuable securities received from one of its customers as a special deposit to be kept simply for the depositor's accommodation and to be returned to him on demand. It was said by the court, Mr. Justice Lumpkin delivering the opinion, that the cashier had nothing to do with the special deposit except to suffer it to remain in a safe place, and that consequently, in taking it to himself, he was stepping aside from his employment to do an act for personal gain.

> "Such an act [to quote directly from the opinion] is lacking both in the rendition of and the intent to render any service to the employer."

To the same effect are Scott & Bro. v. National Bank of Chester Valley, 72 Pa. 477, 13 Am. Rep. 711; First Nat. Bank of Allentown v. Rex, 89 Pa. 312, 33 Am. Rep. 767; Comp v. Carlisle Deposit Bank, 94 Pa. 409; Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 496, 9 Am. Dec. 168; Glover v. Burbridge, 27 S. C. 306, 3 S. E. 471; and Deihl & Lord v. Ottenville, 82 Tenn. (14 Lea) 191.

It follows that the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Shaw and Angellotti, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by A. L. Reed against J. Wing and others, as Trustees of the Town of Fairfield. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. A. McKenzie, of San Francisco, and W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, for appellants. T. T. C. Gregory and Theodore W. Chester, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment against them and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Fairfield is a city or town of the sixth class, organized under the statute of 1883 (St. 1883, p. 93), commonly known as the "Municipal Corporation Law." The defendants are the trustees of the municipality, and the suit was instituted by a citizen and taxpayer of Fairfield to annul an order of the board of trustees declaring that by a certain referendum election an ordinance previously sought to be passed by the trustees had been rejected by the requisite number of voters of the municipality.

On January 13, 1912, the trustees of Fairfield, by a certain by-law known as "Ordinance No. 43," granted, or sought to grant, to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company a franchise to build a spur track over a designated route in said town. Subsequently two petitions, signed by a number of the voters of Fairfield, were presented to the trustees, and they passed "Ordinance No. 44," by which they sought to submit "Ordinance No. 43" to a vote of the citizens of the town. An election was held, and the board of trustees declared that the people had repealed the ordinance in question. It was at this election and at the action of the board of trustees in declaring its result in favor of the objectors to the franchise that plaintiff's attack was directed, and the court gave judgment in his favor to the effect that the election was illegal and void and that the action of the board of trustees in approving and ratifying the said election was similarly a nullity.

[1-3] By demurrer and answer the defendants raised the point that there was a fatal nonjoinder of parties because the railroad company was not made one of such parties, and they make the contention here that the effect of the judgment from which they appeal being to reinstate "Ordinance No. 43" and give to the railroad corporation a valuable franchise, that corporation was a necessary party. But the validity of the original ordinance was not necessarily involved in this controversy. The attack was made merely upon the election and the subsequent order of the board. True, the effect of the judgment was to leave "Ordinance No. 43" just where it was before the election, but it was and is still open to attack upon any suitable ground. The judgment before us would preclude no one from a future attack upon the original or "franchise ordinance" as it is called in the briefs. While the railroad company might have some interest in the outcome of the suit, its interest is not and cannot be the same as that of the plaintiff. It is not denied by plaintiff, and cannot be denied, that according to the general rule, all persons interested in a suit ought to be parties to it, but one of the exceptions to this rule is that where a decree with reference to the subject-matter of the litigation may be made without concluding in any way the rights of a person having an interest, such person is not a necessary party to the action. Story v. Livingston, 13 Pet. 375, 10 L. Ed. 200; Lytle Creek Water Co. v. Perdew, 65 Cal. 455, 4 Pac. 426. It is suggested, however, that if the plaintiff has a right to bring an action of this sort without other parties plaintiff being brought in, all of the citizens in turn, as well as the railroad company, may prosecute separate similar actions, much to the inconvenience of the trustees. The obvious answer to this is that if all of the other citizens and the railway corporation are interested, in the sense that they should be made parties, no taxpayer could prosecute such a suit because of the practical impossibility of finding and bringing into court all of such persons. On the other hand, equity would afford relief if the defendants were harassed by a multiplicity of suits. The plaintiff as a citizen and taxpayer had a right to maintain such an action as this. If the election had ratified the action of the trustees and had resulted in voting to the Southern Pacific Company a valuable franchise, no one would doubt the right of the plaintiff to attack such a disposition of something belonging to the citizens, that is to say, a use of the streets different from that common to all. But a citizen may believe that the city of his residence is injured by a refusal to grant certain privileges to a public utility. Such a citizen may attack the method of the refusal. This is the principle which is supported by such cases as Gibson v. Board of Supervisors, 80 Cal. 359, 22 Pac. 225.

Respondent is of the opinion that the statute under which the election was initiated, called, and held, was repealed by a constitutional amendment passed prior to the holding of the election which we are considering. It is recited in "Ordinance No. 44" that said ordinance was passed for the purpose of holding an election under the amendments to the municipal corporation act, and particularly under section 3 thereof (Stats. 1911, p. 362), which was a re-enactment of section 12 of the original act. This section had reference to referendum elections. It provided that no ordinance should go into effect until the expiration of 30 days after its final passage, and prescribed the procedure for inaugurating a referendum election during such period of 30 days. The section also provided that the movement for a referendum must originate in a petition signed by qualified electors equal in number to 25 per cent. of the entire vote cast at the last preceding general municipal election. After the passage and approval of this amendment to the municipal corporation act just cited, an amendment to the Constitution (section 1 of art. 4) was adopted (October 10, 1911). The section, so far as it relates to this discussion, is as follows:

> "The initiative and referendum powers of the people are hereby further reserved to the electors of each county, city and county, city and town of the state, to be exercised under such procedure as may be provided by law. Until otherwise provided by law, the legislative body of any such county, city and county, city or town may provide for the manner of exercising the initiative and referendum powers herein reserved, * * * but shall not require more than fifteen per cent. of the electors thereof to propose any initiative measure nor more than ten per cent. of the electors thereof to order the referendum. * * * In the submission to the electors of any measure under this section, all officers shall be guided by the general laws of the state, except as * * * otherwise provided. This section is self-executing, but legislation may be enacted to facilitate its operation, but in no way limiting or restricting either the provisions of this section or the powers herein reserved." (See St. 1911, p. 1655.)

Respondent takes the position that this constitutional provision changed the basis for calculating the number of signers who might effectively petition for a referendum election. The statute specified a number of voters equal to 25 per cent. of the vote cast at the last election; the constitution 10 per cent. of the electors of the municipality. The respondent says that the amendment to the Constitution wrought a fundamental change in the method of calculation and thereby repealed the statute in that regard, and that it cannot be said that 25 per cent. of the vote cast at the last general municipal election held in Fairfield before the referendum election took place would equal 10 per cent. of the electors resident in Fairfield when the referendum petition was signed. It frequently happens that a very small percentage of the electors of a town participate in an election. If the number falls below 40 per cent. of the electors, obviously 25 per cent. thereof would be less than 10 per cent. of the registered voters. It is argued, also, that the increase in registration might be so great between an election and the subsequent circulation of a referendum petition that 25 per cent. of the votes cast at the election would by no means equal or exceed 10 per cent. of the number of qualified electors resident in the town at the time of the circulating and filing of the referendum petition. That the statutory and not the constitutional method was followed in the inauguration of this proposed referendum is quite apparent both from the face of the petition and from the ordinance which called the election. The certificate of the town clerk to the petition was, in effect, that it was signed by qualified voters of the town "equal in number to more than twenty-five per cent. of the entire vote cast" at the last general election, and we have seen that the trustees acted upon the same statute as that upon which the clerk depended. But appellants contend that since the initiative and referendum powers of a town are to be exercised "under such procedure as may be provided by law," the amendment to the Constitution had the effect of continuing in force the statutes ordaining the procedure to be followed in movements for the referendum of ordinances. We need not pass upon the constitutional question thus raised, because even upon the basis of the validity of the petition we would be compelled to sustain some of the objections to the regularity of the election. Our reason for avoiding discussion of the constitutional question is that exactly the same problem will not, in all probability, be presented again as the act of March 14, 1911, was formally repealed by the act approved January 2, 1912 (Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 131), and a new act was passed providing by general law the manner of exercising the referendum in municipalities of the class of Fairfield. This act was not in effect until after the circulation of the petition which we are here considering. Const. art. 4, § 1.

[4] One of the valid objections to the regularity of the election is that "Ordinance No. 44," calling the election, was not introduced at a regular or an adjourned meeting. It was stipulated that the regular meeting night of the board of trustees was Tuesday of each week. A regular meeting was held on Tuesday, January 23, 1912. The minutes of that meeting show that the "board adjourned to meet January 25, 1912." No hour for the meeting was specified. A meeting was held on the evening of the 25th at or about the hour for holding regular meetings, and "Ordinance No. 44" was introduced at that meeting. Two of the trustees were absent. It seems to be settled that such a meeting is invalid unless the hour of assembling be specified in the motion to adjourn. San Buenaventura Mfg. Co. v. Vassault, 50 Cal. 537; Thompson v. Williams, 76 Cal. 154, 18 Pac. 153, 9 Am. St. Rep. 187; Smith v. Dorn, 96 Cal. 82, 30 Pac. 1024.

[5] But appellants insist that the board could have called the election by resolution and that for the purposes of this case we should regard "Ordinance No. 44" merely as a resolution in spite of its form. There is authority for treating that which is an ordinance in form as a mere resolution under certain conditions, when only a resolution is required by law, but section 856 of Act 2348, which applies to Fairfield, provides that:

> "All elections in such city or town shall be held in accordance with the general election laws of the state, so far as the same may be applicable. * * * The board of trustees shall give such notice of each election as may be prescribed by ordinance, shall appoint boards of election, and fix their compensation, and establish election precincts and polling places, and may change the same." Stats. 1883, p. 268.

The ordinance in question did prescribe the notice which was to be given the voters. It also provided for the expenditure of money for compensation of election officers. It is the general rule that money may be appropriated only by an act of the Legislature and not by a resolution (Mullan v. State of Cal., 114 Cal. 580, 46 Pac. 670, 34 L. R. A. 262); but we need not here determine whether the same doctrine must be applied to the legislative department of a municipality. It is plain that the notice of an election must be in accordance with an ordinance—either a general by-law or one passed, as this was sought to be passed, for the particular election—and such ordinance not having been introduced at a regular or an adjourned meeting was, as we have seen, void. Consequently the election was called without the notice prescribed by law.

[6, 7] A demurrer to the cross-complaint of defendants was properly sustained. The cross-complaint, so called, was for the most part a reiteration of the matters pleaded in the answer. It further set forth some alleged wrongful acts of the Southern Pacific Company in laying its tracks on certain streets of Fairfield. The prayer was that this action abate until the said railroad company should be made a party; that the court adjudge the railroad company to be without a franchise to lay the said tracks; that "Ordinance No. 43" be declared to be of no present effect and the franchise granted thereby be held to be suspended pending an election; that A. L. Reed be adjudged a person without interest in the controversy; and for general equitable relief. If for no other reason the ruling of the lower court in sustaining the demurrer should be upheld because the cross-complaint sought to bring in a new party not necessary to the decision of the matter before the court. A new party may not be so brought into a case. Code Civ. Proc. § 442; Alpers v. Bliss, 145 Cal. 570, 79 Pac. 171; Merchants' Trust Co. v. Bantel, 10 Cal. App. 76, 101 Pac. 31; Clark v. Kelley, 163 Cal. 209, 124 Pac. 846; Andreson Co. v. Regenold, 166 Cal. 47, 134 Pac. 999.

The relief sought was also foreign to the subject-matter of the suit. Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 83 Cal. 598, 23 Pac. 1102; Lewis v. Fox, 122 Cal. 250, 54 Pac. 823.

No other alleged errors require discussion. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

SLOSS, J. I concur in the judgment. It is not easy to determine whether the complaint is designed as a petition for certiorari or as a bill in equity. It is clear enough that a writ of certiorari could not properly issue, for the reason that the proceeding sought to be reviewed is not judicial in character. And, if the question were new, I should seriously doubt the power of a court of equity to entertain, in the absence of statutory authorization, a suit brought by an elector to overturn or annul the action of the canvassing board in ascertaining and declaring the result of an election. But the propriety of a suit of this character has been upheld by this court in Gibson v. Board of Supervisors, 80 Cal. 359, 22 Pac. 225. I see no satisfactory ground for distinguishing that case from the one at bar, and, as the question is primarily one of procedure, it seems to me that the precedent should be followed.

I am not entirely satisfied that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company should not have been made a party to the proceeding. But the judgment annulling the referendum election was, so far as it went, in favor of that company's claim under the franchise, and a judgment should not be reversed for want of a party who can only be benefited by the judgment as it stands, provided his absence does not affect the rights of other parties. Under the circumstances of this case, and particularly in view of the conclusion that the election was invalid, it is apparent that the appellants are not in any way injured by the failure to bring in the railroad company. The error, if error there was, should accordingly be treated as nonprejudicial.

SHAW, J. I dissent from the judgment of affirmance herein. In my opinion, the plaintiff has no interest sufficient to enable him to maintain the action. He claims no interest except that of a voter of the town and of an owner of property situated therein.

The effect of the ordinance in question was to give the railroad company a right to lay its tracks in the streets and operate a railroad thereon for public use. A private citizen cannot maintain an action either to remove or establish an obstruction in or interference with a public highway unless such obstruction or interference will cause special benefit or special injury to his private rights or his private property. Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156; Lewiston T. Co. v. Shasta, etc., Co., 41 Cal. 562; San Jose Ranch Co. v. Brooks, 74 Cal. 467, 16 Pac. 250; Hargro v. Hodgdon, 89 Cal. 628, 26 Pac. 1106; Bigley v. Nunan, 53 Cal. 403. The plaintiff does not show that his property or private rights will be in any way benefited, damaged, or affected by the validity or invalidity of the franchise. Consequently, so far as the relief asked concerns the said franchise or the use of said street, the plaintiff clearly shows no actual interest.

The only plausible ground upon which it can be contended that the plaintiff has a right to maintain an action to establish such franchise is that it is an action of the same character as that which was declared to be maintainable by a private citizen in Gibson v. Bd. of Supervisors, 80 Cal. 359, 22 Pac. 225. In that case it was held that a taxpayer of a county could maintain a bill in equity to annul the action of the supervisors in fraudulently and wrongfully declaring that the vote at an election held to determine upon the issuance of county bonds was against the bonds, and to obtain a decree declaring that at said election the vote was really in favor of the bonds. If the two actions were identical, this decision would be authority in favor of the plaintiff. But there are important differences between them. In that case, the bond election merely determined the authority of the county board to issue county bonds; it did not purport to, and did not, vest a right of any character in any person. The county itself, being a local subdivision of the state government, had no interest in the matter. There was no person interested in having the bonds issued and the bridges built from the proceeds, except the citizens and taxpayers. If a citizen or taxpayer did not have the capacity to sue to have the real vote declared, the will of the people expressed by the true vote given would be defeated, because of the fraud or mistake of the supervisors in canvassing and declaring the returns A citizen or taxpayer had no remedy provided by law; he could look to equity alone for relief. It was because of these considerations that it was declared in that case that the action could be maintained by a taxpayer. In this case the franchise, if valid, as the plaintiff claims it to be, was vested in the railroad company. That company, of course, had the right to prosecute or defend any action necessary for the protection of such franchise. If the referendum election was invalid for any reason, and the franchise consequently valid, that company could maintain an appropriate action for a judgment to that effect against any person or public authority interfering with its use of the franchise. If the town authorities, or the state, disputed the company's right and attempted to molest it in its exercise of the franchise, by civil suit or criminal prosecution, the company could, in defense, show the invalidity of the proceedings for the election, precisely as the plaintiff here attempted to do. The citizen, or property owner, as we have seen, had no interest in the matter, and there was in existence a party, the railroad company, competent to protect its rights and assert its claims. Therefore the reason upon which the decision in Gibson v. Board of Supervisors was based does not exist in this case. The case is governed by the well-known rule that courts do not entertain or decide cases presented by parties who have no legal or equitable interest in the subject of the action or in the relief asked.

I concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.

CULLEN v. BISBEE. (Sac. 2106, 2127.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1914.)

1. Husband and Wife (§ 208*)—Actions—Necessary Parties.

In a married woman's action on a note which was her separate property, it was not necessary to join her husband as plaintiff, even though the consideration for the note at one time was community property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 756, 757, 760–764; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

2. Husband and Wife (§ 116*)—Community Property—Gifts from Husband to Wife—"Sufficient Consideration."

Defendant's intestate executed a note to a married woman in consideration of an agreement signed by her and her husband that he might make his home in their family whenever he desired. The husband, who signed the agreement and witnessed the note and consented to the arrangement, testified that it was his intention that the note should be his wife's property and not community property. Held, that the note was the separate property of the wife, under Civ. Code, § 158, providing that a husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other or with any other person, respecting property which either might, if unmarried, section 159 providing that a husband and wife cannot by contract with each other alter their legal relations, except as to property, etc., and section 160 providing that the mutual consent of the parties is a sufficient consideration for an agreement mentioned in the last section, as a husband may orally or in writing make a gift to his wife of community property, and, when this is done, it becomes her separate estate, and the effect of the transaction was that the husband, prior to the execution of the note, made a gift to the wife of her services as well as his services in performing the contract constituting the consideration for the note.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sufficient Consideration.]

3. Witnesses (§ 143*)—Competency—Transactions with Decedent—"Assignor."

The note never having been the property of the husband, he was not an incompetent witness, in an action thereon against the maker's administrator, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, providing that parties or assignors of parties cannot be witnesses in an action against an executor or administrator as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of the decedent, as the fact that the consideration of the note at one time was community property did not make him plaintiff's "assignor."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 619–624; Dec. Dig. § 143.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assignor.]

4. Pleading (§ 236*)—Amendment—Trial Amendment—Discretion.

In an action on a note by a married woman, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit defendant, during the course of the trial, to amend his answer by alleging that the note was community property, and that the husband was the real party in interest, where the evidence showed that the note was not community property, and that the defense of nonjoinder, if alleged, would not have been sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 601, 605; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

5. Evidence (§ 35*)—Judicial Notice—Laws of Other States.

Judicial notice cannot be taken that there is no such thing as community property in Maine or Massachusetts, or that in those states a note executed to a wife, with the knowledge and consent of her husband, is prima facie her separate property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 51; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Lottie Currier Cullen against J. G. Bisbee, administrator of Elias S. French, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Meredith & Landis, of Sacramento, for appellant. Cross & Newburgh, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal in No. 2106 is from the judgment; that in No. 2127 is from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial of the action. Both are presented upon a single transcript.

The action is upon a promissory note for $5,000, executed by Elias S. French, in his lifetime, to the plaintiff. The answer denies the execution of the note, and, in effect, it also sets up the defenses of want and failure of consideration. The court found that the note was duly executed and upon a sufficient consideration. After deducting an offset alleged in a counterclaim, which the plaintiff admitted, judgment was given for the balance.

In the course of the trial, it was shown that the plaintiff, at the time the note was executed, was, and ever since has been, the wife of Harry M. Cullen, living with him in that relation. The defendant asked leave to amend his answer by alleging that the note was community property, and that Harry M. Cullen, the plaintiff's husband, was the real party in interest and was not a party to the action. Leave to do this was refused. Harry M. Cullen was allowed to testify as a witness for the plaintiff, over the objection of the defendant that he was a party interested in a claim against the estate of the deceased person, and that, under the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, he was incompetent to testify as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of such deceased person. The court below found that the note was the separate property of the plaintiff, and this finding is challenged as contrary to the evidence. The above rulings and findings are assigned as error.

[1] These points each involve and depend upon the one question whether the note, when executed, was the community property of the spouses or the separate property of the plaintiff. If it was her separate property, it would necessarily follow that the nonjoinder of the husband would be no defense to the action, and he would be a competent witness to matters occurring before the death of French.

[2, 3] The note was executed in connection with a certain contract between French and the plaintiff and her husband. The two documents are as follows:

"Skowhegan, Maine, August 25, 1910.

"For value received, I promise to pay Lottie Currier Cullen or order, five thousand dollars ($5000.00) on demand. Elias S. French.

"Witnesses:
"Abner Currier.
"Harry M. Cullen."

"Skowhegan, Maine, Aug. 25, 1910.

"We severally and jointly agree in consideration of note given Aug. 25, 1910, by Elias S. French to Lottie Currier Cullen, to allow Elias S. French to make his home in our family for as long a time or whenever he desires. And we further agree not to present said note for payment until the family home of Abner Currier is for sale, or at the death of Elias S. French.
"Harry M. Cullen.
"Lottie C. Cullen.

"Witness:
"Abner Currier."

These documents were executed at the farm of Abner Currier, in Skowhegan, Me., under the following circumstances: Abner Currier was the uncle of French and the father of the plaintiff. The mother of French had died when he was three years old, and shortly afterwards he was taken into the family of Abner Currier, whose wife was his mother's sister, and there grew up. Shortly after he became a member of the family, the plaintiff was born. Currier and his ancestors had resided on the farm for several generations. When French was about 18 years of age, he went to California, where he married and accumulated the estate now under administration. His wife died, leaving him childless. A few months before these documents were executed, he had returned to Maine with somewhat impaired health and was living at the Currier home. He wanted to buy the farm from Currier and make a gift of it to the plaintiff for her home. Currier said his price was $5,000, but that he would not sell. French then expressed a wish to do something for plaintiff to enable her to buy it whenever it should be for sale. He then negotiated the arrangement evidenced by the foregoing note and contract. Cullen, the husband, was taken into the conference and consented to the arrangement. The papers were then written by the plaintiff, at French's suggestion, in the husband's absence. When they were ready, Cullen was called in to witness the note and sign the contract. A day or two afterwards French went to the Cullen home in Concord, Mass., and there lived, in pursuance of the contract, until November following. Cullen, the husband, testified that his intention was that the note should be the property of the plaintiff and not community property.

[4] Under these circumstances, the court was justified in finding that the note, at the very time of its execution, was the separate property of the wife. The law in this state on this subject is well established. A husband and wife may, by contract with each other, alter their legal relations as to property. Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159, 160. The husband may orally, or in writing, make to his wife a gift of the community property, and when this is done it becomes her separate estate. Peck v. Brummagin, 31 Cal. 446, 89 Am. Dec. 195; Hamilton v. Hubbard, 134 Cal. 607, 65 Pac. 321, 66 Pac. 860; Dow v. Gould, etc., Co., 31 Cal. 653; Woods v. Whitney, 42 Cal. 361; Higgins v. Higgins, 46 Cal. 263; Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 529, 23 Pac. 695; Kane v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 464; Read v. Rahm, 65 Cal. 344, 4 Pac. 111; Wren v. Wren, 100 Cal. 279, 34 Pac. 775, 38 Am. St. Rep. 287; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 145 Cal. 599, 79 Pac. 272; Perkins v. Sunset, etc., Co., 155 Cal. 719, 103 Pac. 190. The effect of the transaction and the circumstances attending it were that Cullen, prior to the execution of the note, made a gift to his wife of her future services in performance of the contract and of his own services as well. It is settled that this is a valid transaction between them, under the sections of the Code above cited. Wren v. Wren, supra; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, supra. The consequence of this gift is that the consideration of the note was the separate property of the wife. The execution of the note and the contract in the form above shown clearly indicated an intention on the part of the husband that the note itself should be the separate property of the wife and not the property of the community. The finding to that effect is therefore fully sustained by the evidence. This being the case, it would follow that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing permission to the defendant to set up the defense of nonjoinder of the husband. The evidence showed that the husband had no interest, and the defense, if alleged, would not have been sustained.

There was no error in allowing the husband to testify. In Kaltschmidt v. Weber, supra, the husband was allowed to testify under similar conditions. The question is not discussed in the opinion, but the case is a precedent for the proposition that the husband is a competent witness under such circumstances. Section 1880 of the Code makes the party, or assignor of the party, incompetent when the action is against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person. Inasmuch as this note never was the property of the husband, it is obvious that that section does not apply to him. The mere fact that the consideration of the note at one time was community property does not make him either a necessary party to the action or the assignor of the plaintiff. If the husband should make a gift of property to his wife, and she should thereafter sell it, taking a note for the purchase money, it would not be contended that the husband was her assignor merely because he had previously made a gift to her of the property which constituted its consideration. The case at bar is precisely of the same character. The husband gave the consideration to the wife, and she thereupon bargained it away, taking the note as the price. We find no error in the finding or rulings of the court.

[5] We further suggest that if the plaintiff had seen fit to make proof of the law of Maine, where the transaction took place, and of Massachusetts, where the consideration was rendered, perhaps she could have shown that there is no such thing as community property in those states, and that a note executed to a wife, with the knowledge and consent of the husband, is prima facie her separate property, and not that of the husband. This may be easily ascertainable from the authorities. It would have avoided the necessity of the foregoing discussion. But this court cannot take judicial notice of it, in the absence of proof at the trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 281*)—CONTRACT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, in which the claims were prorated out of the contract price, evidence held to sustain a finding that the written contract for the construction of the house on which the liens were claimed was not abrogated by an executed parol contract for the construction of a different house at a larger cost.

LENNON, P. J. This is an action to foreclose certain mechanics' liens upon real property owned by the defendant. Judgment was rendered and entered for the plaintiffs, to the effect that the amount of their respective claims of lien should be prorated out of the sum of $550, which the trial court found was the contract price for the erection of a dwelling house pursuant to the terms of a written contract. Plaintiffs, being dissatisfied with the judgment, have appealed.

Originally there were two independent actions instituted for the foreclosure of the liens in controversy, which for the purpose of trial were consolidated.

The causes of action sued upon arose primarily out of the execution of the following contract:

> "The undersigned, W. H. Shaffer, agrees to construct a replica of a three-room bungalow on 14th street, Oakland, on what is known as the Y. M. C. A. property, excepting as follows: the painting inside and out, the sewer; the same to be constructed on Jones street, Oakland, for the sum of $550, and paid for upon conclusion of this agreement or contract.
> "Signed this 14th day of July, 1910.
> "[Signed] W. H. Shaffer.
> "Jennie E. Andres."

In the court below it was the plaintiffs' contention that this contract was abrogated by an executed parol agreement providing for the erection of a different building, the cost of which, it was claimed, exceeded the sum of $1,000, and that, as no memorandum of the latter contract was ever filed or recorded, judgment should have been directed, foreclosing the liens upon the property for their full amount. Upon the evidence adduced at the trial the lower court, in its findings of fact, declared that the written contract was the only one entered into between the parties, and deduced the conclusion of law therefrom that the several lien claimants were limited in their recovery to the contract price therein stated. Counsel for plaintiffs attacks this finding as being contrary to the evidence, and inconsistent with and repugnant to other material findings.

Briefly stated, the evidence adduced upon the entire case discloses the following facts: The defendant desired to erect a duplicate of a certain building on Fourteenth street in the city of Oakland, and estimated that this could be done for the sum of $550. With that end in view she had several conversations with a contractor named W. H. Shaffer, which culminated in the execution of the contract above recited. Thereupon a rough plan of the building contracted for was made, and was submitted to the defendant for her approval by the contractor. The defendant discovered that a door had been omitted, and the plan was changed accordingly. The defendant had no further conversations with the contractor concerning the cost and construction of the building. The building was constructed according to the plan prepared by the contractor and approved by the defendant. In substance these are the facts and the only facts of the case; and the finding of the trial court that the building was erected pursuant to the terms of the written contract is therefore the only finding possible under the evidence.

In support of the contention that the written contract was abrogated counsel for plaintiffs insists that the building as erected was not in fact an exact replica of the Fourteenth street house referred to in the contract, and in support of this contention relies upon the testimony of two lien claimants to the effect that certain differences existed between the two buildings. The cross-examination of these witnesses discredited, if it did not destroy, their testimony. As against their testimony the defendants produced an architect, apparently a disinterested witness, who testified that he made an inspection of both buildings, and that one was a copy of the other. All of the testimony adduced upon the entire case tends to the conclusion that the building was erected pursuant to the terms of the written contract, and that it was a replica of the building referred to therein. In our judgment there is no evidence of any kind tending to show that the contract was in any manner or at any time departed from, or that a single alteration was made. The testimony of the contractor's brother that certain conversations were had relative to the building after the execution of the contract was subsequently denied by him when the trial court drew his attention to his conflicting testimony, and he then admitted that all conversations relative to the building were had prior to the execution of the contract. The contractor himself was not called as a witness in the case. The claim that the contract was changed by mutual consent is supported only by the statement of the counsel for the plaintiffs.

There is no merit in the claim that the remaining findings in the case are inconsistent and repugnant in themselves.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

2. Judgment (§ 256*) — Findings — Sufficiency.

In an action to recover personal property pledged to defendant, the court found that the goods were delivered to the pledgor by plaintiff, with a memorandum of the property and the price, and that plaintiff agreed with the pledgor to transfer the property to him or his order upon terms and conditions not stated in the memorandum, that said delivery was made with the agreement that the pledgor might dispose of the property, and that plaintiff delivered the property to the pledgor and allowed him to assume the apparent ownership thereof in order to transfer it. Held to sustain a judgment that plaintiff was entitled to possession only upon paying to defendant the amount for which the goods had been pledged to him, under Civ. Code, § 2991, providing that one who has given the appearance of title to another, in order that he may transfer it, cannot defeat a pledge of it to one who acted in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and who gave value.

SHAW, J. This was an action to recover possession of certain personal property, title to which, as alleged, was vested in plaintiff.

Plaintiff was a wholesale dealer or jobber in the sale of jewelry. One C. P. Osgood was engaged in the retail jewelry business and on occasions found customers who desired to purchase goods which he did not carry in stock. From time to time he applied to plaintiff for such articles, which it intrusted to him upon consignment thereof, and if they were sold or retained by him they were either paid for or a charge made against him for the same; otherwise they were returned to plaintiff. About November 7, 1912, Osgood received from plaintiff the goods in question, consisting of two diamonds and one diamond ring. With their delivery there was also delivered to Osgood by plaintiff a memorandum as follows:

> "Memorandum. From Hambright & Walsh, 342 South Broadway, Phone A 3204, Los Angeles, Cal. N. B. These goods are sent for your inspection and are delivered upon the express understanding that the title thereto shall remain in Hambright & Walsh until the purchase price is fully paid. Los Angeles, November 7, 1912. Consigned to C. P. Osgood, City. [Then follows a description of the goods.] Important. When reporting on these goods, please return this bill and see that it is receipted and returned to you."

A few days after receiving the goods from plaintiff, Osgood, without paying for the same, pledged them to defendant to secure the payment of $450. The action is to recover possession of the jewels. The court adjudged that plaintiff was entitled to possession of the goods only upon paying to defendant the amount for which they were pledged. From this judgment plaintiff appeals, adopting the alternative method in presenting the record.

The court found that the goods were delivered to Osgood by plaintiff, as stated, together with the memorandum therewith, stating briefly a description of the property and the price at which it would sell the same, and that plaintiff "agreed with said Osgood * * * substantially that it would transfer and convey to him or to his order said property or any part thereof upon certain terms and conditions not stated in said memoranda, or upon the happening of events not stated in said memoranda." And also found "that said delivery was made in said manner with the real intent and agreement upon the part of the plaintiff that the said Osgood might sell or otherwise dispose of said property provided he paid plaintiff plaintiff's said stated price therefor, or other price that plaintiff might accept, at time or times and upon terms and conditions set out." As a conclusion of law the court found that, in the manner heretofore found, "plaintiff delivered said personal property to the said Osgood and allowed him to assume the apparent ownership of said property for the purpose of making a transfer of it."

[1] Appellant attacks the judgment upon the ground that it is not supported by the findings. The findings are not as clear and explicit as they should be. Nevertheless, it is a rule of law that any uncertainties or ambiguities in findings must be construed, if possible, so as to support the judgment. Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; People v. McCue, 150 Cal. 195, 88 Pac. 899; Murphy v. Stelling, 8 Cal. App. 702, 97 Pac. 672. The memorandum delivered with the goods does not purport to show the making of a conditional sale to Osgood, or, in fact, that any sale of the goods was made to him; hence the transaction cannot be construed as a conditional sale. While, as stated, the goods were delivered to Osgood for his inspection, the title to remain in plaintiff until the purchase price was fully paid, it was further agreed, as found by the court, that Osgood might sell or dispose of the same, provided he made payment therefor to plaintiff. In other words, while Osgood, as shown, was authorized to sell the goods, plaintiff insists no title could pass unless he paid plaintiff the agreed purchase price of the goods, thus imposing upon the one purchasing from Osgood the duty of seeing that the money paid for the goods so bought was delivered to plaintiff, who was unknown in the transaction. Notwithstanding the findings are awkwardly drawn, it sufficiently appears therefrom that, in the transaction between Osgood and plaintiff, the former was authorized to make a sale and transfer of the goods.

[2] As we view the finding, it brings the case within the provisions of section 2991, Civil Code, as follows:

> "One who has allowed another to assume the apparent ownership of property for the purpose of making any transfer of it, cannot set up his own title, to defeat a pledge of the property, made by the other, to a pledgee who received the property in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and for value."

[3] Thus construed, appellant insists the findings are not supported by the evidence. A brief reference to the evidence shows that this contention is also without merit. According to testimony given on behalf of plaintiff, its business transactions with Osgood commenced about a year before the transaction in question. Osgood, to whom plaintiff extended some credit, carrying his name upon its ledger, received goods from plaintiff on consignment. These goods he would display in his place of business. A witness for plaintiff testified as follows:

> "He (Osgood) sold the goods, * * * on the installment plan, the same as any of these retail houses, at so much down and so much a month. Q. Then how did he report to you, and how did he pay you? Tell us in full. A. Immediately when he had sold a watch or any other item to any person, he would either pay us at once, or we would charge him on the ledger. Our transaction was ended as far as the sale was concerned; then it was a matter of collecting the money. Q. Then whom would you collect the money of? A. C. P. Osgood. Q. You didn't know who the purchaser was, did you? A. No, sir; we had nothing to do, we did not—we sell only to retail jewelers; we don't sell to the customer direct. Q. You trusted Osgood in those particulars? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, where he would sell something on the installment plan, would you wait until he had been paid? A. We had nothing to do with that; we charged the goods on our ledger and expected our pay on regular time."

It may be conceded that reading the entire testimony given on behalf of plaintiff discloses inconsistent statements, some of which are made by the same witness. The weight accorded such testimony, however, is for the trial court to pass upon. The evidence, taken as a whole, fairly justifies the inference that plaintiff delivered the goods in question to Osgood, not for his inspection, but for the inspection of his prospective customers to whom it was understood and intended that he should, if possible, at a price fixed by him, sell the goods, in which event he should pay plaintiff the agreed price therefor, otherwise return them. Under the laws of this state one may make a conditional sale, delivering possession of, but retaining title to, the property, in which case the seller may recover possession where a transfer of title is attempted without compliance with the conditions. The case at bar presents no facts bringing it within this rule. The fact that Osgood, instead of selling the goods and paying plaintiff as it was intended he should do, violated the trust reposed in him by pledging them in payment for a loan, does not entitle plaintiff to a recovery from one having no knowledge of the arrangement and who, upon faith of the apparent ownership with which plaintiff had clothed the possessor, parted with his money in exchange for the goods.

The judgment is affirmed.

Corporations (§ 399*)—Authority of Agent—"Actual Authority."

Where a solicitor of a corporation engaged in manufacturing and selling building accessories presented to a building contractor a typewritten order signed by a third person in the employ of the corporation as estimator, to furnish accessories, and the contractor did not accept the order until he had obtained a contract to erect a building, the contractor could only rely on the actual authority of the solicitor in making contracts, within Civ. Code, § 2316, defining "actual authority" as such as a principal intentionally confers on the agent, or intentionally or by want of ordinary care allows the agent to believe himself to possess, and not on the theory of ostensible authority, within section 2334, making a principal bound by acts of his agent under a merely ostensible authority, to those persons, who in good faith and without want of ordinary care, incurred liability on the faith thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Stephens & Stephens, of Los Angeles, for appellant. R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff is a building contractor, and was engaged in that business during the year 1911. Defendant corporation was at the same time engaged in the business of conducting a milling establishment and furnishing sash, doors, screens, glass, and other building accessories. Plaintiff, intending to offer a bid upon a contract to construct a certain apartment house, requested of the defendant that it furnish to him an estimate of the cost of screens and cabinetwork, sash, doors, et cetera, which would be required in the construction of that building. The vice president of defendant, who acted generally as its manager, informed plaintiff that a solicitor of defendant named Stum would see him, and subsequently Stum brought to the plaintiff a typewritten offer under the printed bill head of defendant. This document was typewritten, except that it bore in the lower left-hand corner thereof the name of one Thompson, written in longhand. Thompson, it appeared by the evidence, was a man specially employed as an estimator or calculator. After receiving this proposal, plaintiff proceeded to make his bid for the building contract, and was awarded the work, being the lowest bidder. Some days later he held a conversation with Stum in which he brought up the question as to whether the estimate, as furnished, included all wire glass required in the building, and, in order to meet his objection that the offer was not clear upon this point, Stum wrote in longhand over his own signature the words: "This bid includes all wire glass but elevator inclosures." Thereupon plaintiff placed his signature at the foot of the paper under printed words which were a direction to defendant to enter his order for the materials. Upon this paper being returned to defendant by Stum, and within two days thereafter, defendant, by its representative Homann, wrote to plaintiff and called his attention to the fact that the bid of defendant did not include all wire glass, because that glass of itself would amount in value to more than $2,000. The total bid as specified in the typewritten document was for the sum of $2,113. In this letter request was made for a new order to be signed by plaintiff, with a notation to be added as follows: "This bid includes all glass in all wooden sash and doors." It appeared that the metal sash into which the bulk of the wire glass used in the building was to be placed was ordered by the plaintiff from another firm, and was not intended to be included in the merchandise furnished by the defendant. However, plaintiff insisted that he had made a contract with the defendant by which the latter was obligated to furnish all of the wire glass, whether used in wooden sash or metal sash, as needed in the construction of the building. Defendant flatly refused to furnish this glass or any of the merchandise, and the plaintiff purchased the same elsewhere, and brought this action for damages. The trial judge decided the issues in his favor, and this appeal was taken from that judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The entire case seems to turn upon the one question as to whether Stum, when he indorsed the written paragraph across the face of the typewritten proposal, did so with authority as a representative of his principal. Under the other facts shown in the case this authority must necessarily have been actual authority, which is defined to be such authority "as a principal intentionally confers upon the agent, or intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, allows the agent to believe himself to possess." We have said that, necessarily, in order to bind the defendant, the authority of Stum must have been actual, and for this reason the bid, as presented to Herington, amounted to a mere proposal or offer to make a contract. It was not accepted by the plaintiff, nor attempted to be accepted until after he had secured the contract to construct the apartment house. The offer, as counsel for appellant properly states, might have been withdrawn at any time up to the moment of its acceptance. Therefore it cannot be said that, by reason of any act of the defendant in the way of conferring any ostensible authority upon its agent Stum, damage resulted to Herington. In order that a person dealing with an agent may recover damages for breach of a contract resting solely upon authority of ostensible nature, it must have happened that such person, by reason of his reliance upon the ostensible authority, incurred a liability or parted with value. Section 2334, Civ. Code. So all of the argument, so far as it touches upon the question of the claimed ostensible authority of Stum, may be left out of account in determining the questions here involved. It was conceded, or at least it appears by every fair inference to be drawn from the testimony of the plaintiff, that Herington did not understand that the proposal of defendant, as submitted to him, included all wire glass. He insisted upon the clause mentioned being added thereto. He had never accepted the offer up to the time that this clause was attached to the paper. He testified as follows:

> "Q. You didn't sign the order for it until you had that written in? A. No. Q. You would not have signed it until you did have that written in? A. No; I don't suppose I would; not after I took the stand."

We therefore reach the question as to whether actual authority had been conferred by Stum's principal which would entitle Stum to bind the defendant by a contract such as that which the writing added by him to the bid would create. There was no testimony at all in contradiction of that given by officers of the company and by Stum himself, which in positive terms denied that any such authority was conferred. That actual authority which is conferred through the negligence or want of ordinary care on the part of the principal is only such as the principal allows the agent to believe himself to possess. Section 2316, Civ. Code. Whatever strangers may understand to be the limit of actual authority is an immaterial matter, for the implied authority of an agent upon which third persons are authorized to rely is the ostensible authority or that authority arising by want of ordinary care of the principal which causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess. As before mentioned, the question of ostensible authority, if any were shown in this case, is wholly immaterial, as it did not appear that through reliance upon any such authority the respondent had suffered damages. The conclusions already suggested are sufficient to indicate that a reversal must be ordered in this case. It may be added that from the evidence it would not seem that Herington was authorized to take it for granted that, by reason of his employment as a solicitor, Stum possessed the authority to change, modify, or add to a bid or proposal such as that which was submitted by the appellant. Upon the face of the written offer it clearly appeared to have been prepared in the offices of appellant and it bore the signature of a person other than the solicitor. It was a proposal covering a variety of material and articles which were offered seemingly in competition with other bidders. The evidence that Stum had made two or more offers to other persons to sell them wire glass and had quoted them figures as to the selling price thereof, would not, to our minds, establish such a condition as to authorize a person in respondent's position to assume that Stum possessed authority to alter the written proposal for a general lot of materials to be used in the performance of a building contract. Moreover, to that written proposal by Stum was attached Stum's signature only, and not the signature of appellant corporation, and it appears that plaintiff himself called Stum's attention to the fact, and asked why the name of the company was not signed. From this it is shown that the plaintiff himself had in mind a question as to the authority of Stum to act for his principal.

For the reasons stated, we conclude that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings and judgment made in favor of the plaintiff.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. DABNER. (Cr. 268.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 27, 1914.)

LEWDNESS (§ 5*)—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment charging specific acts held to charge a violation of Pen. Code, § 288, making it an offense for any person to commit any lewd and lascivious act upon any child under the age of 14 years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Lewdness, Cent. Dig. §§ 7–12; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Anton Dabner was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Bell, of Napa, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The defendant was convicted by a jury upon an amended indictment in which it was charged that, on or about October 15, 1913, at the county of Napa, he "did then and there willfully, unlawfully and feloniously commit a certain lewd and lascivious act upon and with the body, and certain parts thereof, of one Crystal Davidson, a female child under the age of fourteen years, to wit, of the age of eight years, by the said Anton Dabner then and there inserting and placing his hands up under the clothes and through and inside of the drawers of said Crystal Davidson, with intent then and there of arousing, appealing to and gratifying the lust, passion and sexual desires of him, the said Anton Dabner, contrary," etc.

The crime charged is defined by section 288 of the Penal Code, which reads:

> "Any person who shall willfully and lewdly commit any lewd or lascivious act other than the acts constituting other crimes provided for in part two of this Code upon or with the body, or any member thereof, of a child under the age of fourteen years, with the intent of arousing, appealing to, or gratifying the lust or passions of sexual desires of such person, or of such child, shall be guilty," etc.

The only point made in defendant's brief is:

> "That the act described does not constitute a lewd and lascivious act under the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code; that that act could only be committed upon or with the body, or some part or member thereof, of a child under the age of 14 years. There is no allegation in the indictment that the defendant herein ever placed his hands upon or in any way violated or touched the body, or any part or member thereof, of the said Crystal Davidson. It is not even charged that the clothes and the drawers mentioned in said indictment were upon the person of the said Crystal Davidson."

Furthermore, it is claimed that defendant did not waive this infirmity in the indictment by failure to demur to the indictment, for the reason, as is claimed, that where the indictment fails to state a public offense the failure to demur, specially or otherwise, cannot be deemed a waiver of an objection based upon such ground, citing People v. Grinnell, 9 Cal. App. 239, 98 Pac. 681; People v. Smith, 103 Cal. 563, 37 Pac. 516.

There was evidence sufficient to justify the jury in finding that defendant did in fact place one of his hands under the clothing of the child and through an opening in her drawers to a point of her person which we need not designate, while at the same time hugging and kissing her. The act occurred while the child was riding with him in a cart at his solicitation; he having picked her up on the way home from a country schoolhouse. There was also evidence that when he lifted her out of the cart he did so in an unseemly manner and asked her to go with him behind a nearby tree or some bushes. She refused, and he then kissed her, gave her ten cents, and she went on her way home, and shortly after reaching home, made complaint to her mother.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In his argument, at the hearing, defendant's counsel contended that the crime contemplated by the statute was not sufficiently charged if it fell short of alleging that the accused touched the naked body or some part of the body in fondling or manipulating the person of the child; and that by "inserting and placing his hands up under the clothes and through the inside of the drawers of said Crystal Davidson with the intent," etc., was insufficient to charge the crime. We cannot agree with this view of the law. The statute punishes any lewd or lascivious act willfully and lewdly committed upon or with the body, or any member thereof, of a child with intent of arousing or gratifying the lust or sexual desires of either the perpetrator or his victim. It needs no argument to show that what is here alleged might well import the criminal intention mentioned in the statute, even if, what seems almost a physical impossibility, in doing the alleged act defendant did not touch the naked body of the child. It is easily conceivable that there may be lewd and lascivious acts with the body of a child importing the intent contemplated by the statute where the hands of the perpetrator do not touch the flesh. Acts may be committed with the clothed body which may be lewd and lascivious and be committed with intent to gratify or arouse sexual desires.

We think the indictment was sufficient to charge a crime under section 288 of the Penal Code.

It would be a reproach to the law to hold that a person may, with the intent charged, do to a child what is here alleged against defendant and not be guilty of violating this statute.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BORGFELDT v. CURRY. (Civ. 1386.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 26, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 24, 1914.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 5*)—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Civ. Code, § 3439, providing that every transfer of property with intent to defraud or delay any creditor is void against all the creditors of the transferror, and section 3442, providing that no transfer shall be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration except that a transfer given voluntarily by one who is insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency shall be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors, should be liberally construed to effectuate their purpose to prevent debtors from placing property which legitimately should be available for the payment of their debts beyond the reach of their creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 6; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 297*)—EVIDENCE—CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY.

In a suit to quiet title to land conveyed to plaintiff by her husband without a valuable consideration, evidence held sufficient to show that the conveyance was made in contemplation of insolvency by the husband, and was therefore void as against existing creditors.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 61*)—INSOLVENCY OF GRANTOR—CONTEMPLATION OF INSOLVENCY.

Under Civ. Code, § 3442, providing that a voluntary transfer of property made by one who is insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency is void against existing creditors, it is immaterial that a debtor who transferred property in contemplation of insolvency was in fact solvent at the time.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Anna Borgfeldt against F. H. Curry. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions to enter a judgment for the defendant.

Charles W. Slack, of San Francisco, for appellant. Hillyer, Stringham & O'Brien, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff brought this suit to quiet her title to two pieces of real property in San Francisco theretofore conveyed to her in consideration of love and affection by her husband, Christoph J. Borgfeldt. F. H. Curry, the defendant, claimed an interest in the property by virtue of the levy of an attachment thereon in an action which he, as assignor of the Banca Svizzera Americana of Locarno, brought upon two joint and several promissory notes theretofore made by said Christoph J. Borgfeldt, and three other persons or corporations, to said bank; it being claimed by said Curry that the transfer of said real property to plaintiff was fraudulent as against the holder and owner of said promissory notes. In the present action Curry answered, setting up the execution of the notes to the bank, and the assignment thereof to him, and pleaded that the said transfer was made by said Borgfeldt while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, and was therefore void as to him and his assignor by virtue of the latter's ownership of the promissory notes hereinbefore mentioned at the time of said transfer. Upon the trial the court found the facts in accordance with the allegations of the defendant's answer with the exception of the allegation that the transfer was fraudulent as to creditors, and accordingly quieted plaintiff's title to the real property. It denied the defendant's motion for a new trial, and the appeal is from such order and from the judgment.

It is contended by the appellant that the evidence does not support the judgment inasmuch as it shows that said transfer was in fact made by the plaintiff's husband while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency.

[1] The law applicable to the question is found in sections 3439 and 3442 of the Civil Code. Those sections read, respectively, as follows:

> "Sec. 3439. Every transfer of property or charge thereon made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken, with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands, is void against all creditors of the debtor, and their successors in interest, and against any person upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor."
> "Sec. 3442. In all cases arising under section 1227, or under the provisions of this title, except as otherwise provided in section 3440, the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact and not of law; nor can any transfer or charge be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration; provided, however, that any transfer or incumbrance of property made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall be fraudulent, and void as to existing creditors."

(We need not consider sections 1227 and 3440 referred to in the last-quoted section, as it is not claimed that they have any bearing upon the question before us.)

These sections, in common with the remainder of the Code, should be liberally construed with a view to effecting their purpose. That purpose undoubtedly is to prevent debtors from placing property which legitimately should be available for the satisfaction of demands of creditors beyond their reach, or, in other words, to compel a person engaging in business to take the hazards and risks thereof as well as the chances for profit. If misfortune should overtake him, he must face it himself, and not attempt to saddle it onto those who have extended him credit and trusted in his commercial integrity.

[2] In the case at bar the transfer of the property involved was made about three weeks after the great earthquake and fire which occurred in San Francisco on April 18, 1906. At the time of the catastrophe Borgfeldt was engaged in a grocery and retail and wholesale liquor business with a brother as partner, and in addition owned an interest in another business. Both of these businesses were entirely wiped out by the fire, and the customers widely dispersed. The books of the grocery and liquor concern showed accounts payable amounting to $10,000, and accounts receivable amounting to about $9,000. It subsequently turned out that the firm collected 90 per cent. of these accounts and also collected a certain amount of insurance; but it is a matter of common knowledge that at the time in question retail merchants in San Francisco whose businesses were located in the burned area did not expect to be able to collect any such percentage of their accounts, to say nothing regarding the uncertainty of collecting fire losses. For three months after the disaster Borgfeldt had no income, and on the day before the transfer embarked in a new business, the future of which in the unsettled condition of San Francisco neither he nor any one else could predict. Of the two promissory notes above referred to, one became due three days after the date of the transfer by Borgfeldt to his wife, and the other eighteen days after said date. The financial condition of his cosigners of the promissory notes was also badly affected by the San Francisco disaster. Every fair inference arising from the testimony as to Borgfeldt's circumstances and financial prospects at the time characterizes the transfer of this real property as one made to save it from the almost certain claims of creditors. We have, moreover, his own admission to the following effect:

> "The real reason why this transfer was made to my wife was this, that a year or so before the fire I began to go into this mining proposition. I stuck in $6,000 first. Then I put in another $2,500; and my wife thought it would be better, if I go to work and put all my money in the mining, and she gets nothing for herself, so it was agreed then that I turn the property over to her, and then when this fire came along and all mine was gone—if the property had been burned out that would have been all gone—so for that reason the transfer was made."

That the object of the transfer was to save the property from the claims of creditors rather than to make an absolute gift of it to the plaintiff may also be legitimately inferred from the fact that six months after the transfer the plaintiff borrowed upon the security of the property the sum of $5,000, which was placed in the business enterprise above mentioned in which her husband had embarked; stock in the concern however being taken in the plaintiff's name.

[3] The principal argument in the briefs of both appellant and respondent is addressed to the question as to whether at the time of the transfer Borgfeldt was actually solvent or insolvent. Appellant constructs from the testimony a table of assets and liabilities, which he contends shows Borgfeldt to be insolvent. Respondent takes the same table, and contends that it proves the contrary. The difference between them arises from the item of $1,000, previously referred to as having been put into a new business on the day preceding the transfer; the appellant contending that this sum should not be regarded as assets, and the respondent contending that it should, and that, so regarding it, the assets of Borgfeldt were superior to his liabilities by the sum of about $300. In the view we take of the case, however, it matters not whether this sum is included in Borgfeldt's assets or not. Admitting that by a small margin he may be shown to have been solvent, it still remains patent from the evidence that the transfer was made in contemplation of insolvency, and, as such, is equally within the terms of the sections of the Code cited.

For the reasons stated, the finding of the trial court is not supported by the evidence. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the court directed to enter a judgment for the defendant for his costs.

MILLER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF KERN COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1666.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 13, 1914.)

1. Elections (§ 154*) — Primary Election Law — Contest — Construction — "After Completion of the Final Canvass."

Under section 22 of primary election law (St. 1913, p. 1379), providing for the canvass of the returns, and section 28, providing that the contestant may file an affidavit initiating a contest within five days "after the completion of the final canvass," the time for filing the affidavit does not begin to run until the board of canvassers has declared the result, even though they have occupied more than the time limited by law for the canvass.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 136; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

2. Elections (§ 154*)—Contest—Votes Considered—Inadmissible Evidence.

In a contest of a primary election, evidence as to the choice of qualified voters who were not permitted to vote because "not upon the great register," or whose affidavit of registration had been lost, is not admissible to determine who received the most votes, but only the legal votes actually cast can be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 136; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

3. Prohibition (§ 10*)—Grounds—Jurisdiction—Excess of—Evidence.

The improper reception and use of evidence by the court in determining a special proceeding in which no appeal is allowed, is in excess of its jurisdiction, so as to be the proper subject for a writ of prohibition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Cent. Dig. §§ 37-56; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

Petition by I. L. Miller and Jerry Shields against the Superior Court of Kern County and Hon. Milton T. Farmer and others, judges thereof, for a writ of prohibition in election contest. Petition granted in part.

E. J. Emmons, J. R. Dorsey, Matthew S. Platz, and Geo. E. Whitaker, all of Bakersfield, for petitioners. E. L. Foster and E. F. Brittan, both of Bakersfield, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petitioners were candidates at the August primary election of 1914 for nomination as candidates for the offices of county clerk and county treasurer, respectively, of the county of Kern. The board of supervisors of that county, having completed its canvass, has declared that petitioners have, respectively, received the highest number of votes cast for said offices. Contests are now pending in the superior court of said county, one against the nomination of petitioner I. L. Miller for the office of county clerk, and the other against petitioner Jerry Shields for the office of county treasurer. These contests, having been consolidated for the purposes of trial, are now being tried in said court.

No alternative writ has been issued, but the petitioners and the respondents are before the court at the time of application for the writ, and by stipulation the court will make its order upon the record before it as upon a return to an alternative writ. The record produced consists of the petition for the writ and a transcript of certain evidence that has been taken in the hearing of said contests in the superior court.

On account of the urgency for immediate disposition of the matter, the court, on October 8, 1914, in open court, made its order as herein stated. It appears that the actual canvassing of the primary election returns, other than the order of the board of supervisors declaring the result of the canvass, all occurred prior to the 18th day of September, 1914, and that the order of said board declaring the result of the canvass was made and entered on the 18th day of September. The affidavits of contest were not filed until the 23d day of September. It further appears that in said affidavits of contest it was alleged by each contestant that a large number of alleged voters within various precincts in the county of Kern were not permitted to vote, and could not vote, because their names were not upon the register; neither were the original affidavits of registration or duplicates thereof at the time in the office of the county clerk of Kern county, where they are required by law to be; and that a large number of voters who had registered in accordance with law had a right to vote in their several precincts, but were denied the right to vote for the reasons above stated, and that said voters intended to and would have voted for the contestants if they had been permitted to cast their ballots in their respective precincts. It is further shown by petitioners that the superior court, in the trial of said contests, will permit said alleged disfranchised voters to testify that they registered as electors of said precincts according to law, notwithstanding the fact that their names were "not upon the Great Register" of the county, and that they would have voted for the contestants if they had been permitted to cast their ballots. It appears that, the offer of such evidence having been objected to by the petitioners, the objections have been overruled, and the court, unless prohibited from so doing, will hear said evidence and admit the same on the hearing of said contests.

[1] Petitioners insist that, upon the facts shown, the contests were not filed within the time provided by the primary election law, and that the court is without jurisdiction to hear the same. It is further contended by petitioners that the superior court is without jurisdiction to consider said contests in so far as they are based upon said alleged facts with regard to electors whose names are not upon the register and who were not permitted to vote.

The court is of the opinion that the five days' time provided by the primary election law for the filing of contests did not begin to run until the board of supervisors had declared the result of the canvass of the returns—that is to say, not until the 18th day of September, 1914—and that the contests, having been filed on the fifth day thereafter, were filed within due time. Section 22 of the primary election law (Stats. 1913, p. 1379) provides that the board of supervisors shall meet at a specified time to canvass the returns. "When begun the canvass shall be continued until completed, which shall not be later than six o'clock in the afternoon of the sixteenth day following such primary election. The clerk of the board must, as soon as the result is declared, enter upon the records of such board a statement of such result," etc. Section 28 of the same act provides that any candidate at a primary election desiring to contest the nomination of another candidate for the same office "may, within five days after the completion of the final canvass, file an affidavit," etc. This affidavit is the basis of a contest in which the ballots may be recounted before the superior court. September 10, 1914, was the sixteenth day following the August primary election, and petitioners contend: First, that for the purpose of fixing the time within which a contest may be instituted, it must be conclusively presumed that the canvass was completed not later than September 10th at 6 o'clock in the afternoon; and, second, that at all events the formal declaration of the result is not a part of the canvass. As part of the first contention petitioners' counsel insist that after the sixteenth day the board of supervisors was without jurisdiction to do any further acts in connection with the canvass of the returns of said election.

The portions of the law to which we have referred contemplate prompt action in order that the names of the persons nominated may be known in due time so that they may be placed upon the ballot for the November election, and a careful compliance with the provisions of the law as to the time within which the several acts should be done is necessary. But this does not compel us to adopt a construction of the statute which, in some instances of neglect or misconduct, would make it impossible to ascertain the candidates between whom the choice must be made at the final election. If, by reason of neglect or misconduct, it should appear, after the expiration of the time named in the statute, that the board of supervisors would not declare the result of the canvass, any elector within the county or district might institute appropriate proceedings to compel action by these officers. The courts are open for such purposes, and are expected to dispose of such matters with such promptness as will meet the emergency. Until the board of supervisors has declared the result of the canvass, no one is in a position to know whether a contest is necessary to protect any interest that he may have in the result. The preliminary examinations of the returns and computations made thereon are merely the evidence upon which the declaration of the result is made to depend. This declaration bears the same relation to the previous proceedings as the findings and judgment bear to the previous record in an action at law. It is therefore our opinion that the words above quoted from section 28, limiting the time for initiating a contest to five days "after the completion of the final canvass," refer to a period of five days after the declaration of the result.

[2] The court is further of opinion that the refusal of the election officers to receive the votes of said electors who were not permitted to vote is not a proper ground of contest, and that the superior court is without right or jurisdiction to receive said offered evidence, or to consider the same as a ground of contest. In contests of this character the question is which candidate received the highest number of legal votes, and not which candidate would have received the highest number if every person claiming the right to a vote had been permitted to do so. It is unfortunate if some electors who made their affidavits of registration in due time before the proper officer were deprived of their right through failure of that officer to preserve those affidavits or any legal evidence of the right of these electors to vote at the election. But a greater evil to the public would follow from the contrary rule. We cannot imagine any rule that would more effectively open the door for successful perjury than a rule which would permit persons to come into court after the apparent result of a close election has been published and allow them to testify that they did make affidavits of registration which have been lost or destroyed, and that, if permitted to vote, they would have voted for the contestant.

[3] Ordinarily, the acceptance of such testimony and the use of it by the court in determining the contest would be merely an appealable error. It would be merely an error of the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction, and not an action in excess of such jurisdiction. But since the contest provided for in said section 28 is a special proceeding concerning which it is provided that "such decision or judgment of the court shall be final in every respect and no appeal can be taken therefrom," it follows that there would be no adequate remedy at law if the superior court, assuming jurisdiction of an alleged contest, should attempt to hear and determine said contest upon allegations which do not legally constitute a ground of contest. It is reasonable to say that a judgment based upon such alleged facts would be in excess of the jurisdiction of the court and would constitute a proper subject for a writ of prohibition.

In accordance with this opinion, an order has been entered granting the writ of prohibition applied for herein solely and only to the extent that by such writ the superior court of Kern county will be prohibited from considering said ground of contest with respect to the electors above mentioned whose votes were not received at the primary election.

As to any other grounds of contest involved in the affidavits of contest to which reference has been made, the petition has been denied.

HILLGER v. YENRICK. (Civ. 1564.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District. California. Oct. 10, 1914.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1091*)—Presumptions—Appeal from Justice Court.

It will be presumed, in the absence of a contrary showing, that an appeal from a justice court was taken on questions of both law and fact, and the superior court heard the case anew.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4302–4311, 4331; Dec. Dig. § 1091.*]

2. Justices of the Peace (§ 45*)—Jurisdiction—Amount—Counterclaim.

The jurisdiction of a justice's court of an action involving a money demand, within the limit of jurisdiction fixed, cannot be ousted by a counterclaim to recover more than the limit fixed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 173–175; Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 32*)—Decisions Reviewable—Judgment of Superior Court on Appeal from Justice's Court.

Where an appeal is taken from a judgment of a justice for $100, the limit of its jurisdiction, in an action to recover that sum as money paid on a contract of sale not carried out, and the case is tried anew in the superior court and judgment rendered for the same sum, an appeal to the District Court of Appeal will not lie on the theory that, because defendant in justice court filed a counterclaim, which was abandoned in the superior court, claiming the whole of the purchase money, that the superior court exercised original jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by R. E. Hillger against N. Yenrick. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Theron Stevens, of San Diego, and J. R. Gilliland, of Glendora, for appellant. Young C. Burkhart, of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was originally brought in the justice's court to recover $100 alleged to have been paid by respondent as part of the purchase price of certain lots of land in the county of San Diego which appellant agreed to transfer to him. The contract was evidenced by a writing in the form of a receipt which, after setting forth a description of the property and the fact of the payment of $100, provided that the balance of the purchase price should be paid—

> "upon delivery of certificate complete to date of transfer from a responsible abstract company in the city of San Diego; said certificate to show said property free from all incumbrances and execution of good and sufficient deed, on or before 15 days from date. * * * And if the balance of ...... dollars is not paid as stipulated and agreed, the above contract is null and void, and all moneys paid shall be forfeited as agreed damages for failure of purchaser to perform this contract. Should such abstract or certificate show the title to said property as not being free from incumbrances as above stated, the deposit shall be returned to said purchaser."

The respondent alleged in his complaint that he had been ready to perform and had performed all of the obligations required of him, but that more than 15 days had elapsed and that the appellant had failed to deliver to him a deed or furnish the certificate in the manner agreed. In the justice's court appellant filed an answer and counterclaim in which he took issue on the facts alleged in plaintiff's complaint and sought to recover the balance of seven hundred dollars which respondent had agreed to pay upon the conditions of the contract in his favor being performed. This answer and the counterclaim as filed in the justice's court were verified, appellant seeking thereby to raise a question as to the title or right to possession of real property which would oust the justice's court of jurisdiction. However, the justice of the peace proceeded to try the action and, notwithstanding a motion to have it certified to the superior court, judgment was rendered for $100 as prayed for in the complaint, and an appeal was then regularly taken to the superior court.

[1] We must assume that the appeal was taken on questions of both law and fact, for the contrary does not appear, and the superior court proceeded to hear and determine all of the issues in the case, both law and fact, anew. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and an amended complaint was filed, which set out with more detail the circumstances of the contract and the actions of the parties had in connection therewith, and again repeated the prayer for judgment in the sum of $100. A demurrer stating general grounds was filed to the amended complaint and overruled. Appellant then filed an answer and what he termed a cross-complaint, repeating in effect all of the allegations set up by his alleged counterclaim in the justice's court. The respondent made no answer to the cross-complaint, and the action went to trial as to the issues made up on the amended complaint and the denials contained in the answer. Again judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $100 and costs. This appeal, taken from that judgment, followed.

---

[2, 3] The action was an action at law for the recovery of money only and involving an amount within the jurisdiction of the justice's court. No question concerning the matter of title or possession of real property was shown to be involved from the contents of the answer as filed, or the counterclaim. The fact that the defendant sought by counterclaim to recover more than the amount fixed as the limit of the jurisdiction of the justice's court could not oust that court of jurisdiction. The justice of the peace might have stricken the alleged counterclaim from the files, but he did not commit error in proceeding to the trial without taking such action. In the superior court the alleged cross-complaint seems to have been ignored by both the respondent and the trial judge. It was improperly on the files of the court, and it must be assumed, if it is necessary so to do to support the judgment, that it was so disregarded and treated as of no effect. We do not think that the superior court attempted to exercise original jurisdiction at the trial of the action, as it rendered judgment for only the amount of $100 and attached costs thereto as part of the recovery, which could not have been done had the action been one of original jurisdiction with that court. Such a state of facts being disclosed it is manifest that no appeal could properly have been taken from the judgment last entered to this court, as the judgment of the superior court was final.

It is ordered that the appeal be dismissed, with costs to the respondent.

POETKER v. LOWRY. (Civ. 1518.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 22, 1914.)

1. Bills and Notes (§ 470*)—Action on—Demurrer—Insufficient Allegations in Complaint.

In a complaint on a note, an allegation that "defendant has refused, and still refuses, to pay the same" is not a sufficient allegation of nonpayment of a matured debt as against a general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1462; Dec. Dig. § 470.*]

2. Pleading (§ 207*)—Special Demurrer—Complaint.

Where the allegation of nonpayment in a suit on a note is in the form of a conclusion, or is such that nonpayment is implied, the attack must be by special demurrer, pointing out the defect, and a general demurrer is insufficient.

3. Contracts (§ 108*)—Consideration.

Under Civ. Code, § 197, giving the father the right to the custody and services of his minor child, an agreement by the mother alone, while living with the husband and father, to continue to keep, care for, and support the child, instead of giving it away, as she desired to do, is not a valid consideration for a contract by a third person to compensate the mother therefor; as it would be compensating her for refraining from doing what she could not legally do without her husband's consent, and also for performing the duty which the law lays on parents to care for their children.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by F. W. Poetker against Rosa B. Lowry. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gray, Barker & Bowen, of Los Angeles, and George A. Skinner, of Long Beach, for appellant. Bicksler & Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action upon a promissory note alleged to have been made by defendant to plaintiff. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

[1] Defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled. This ruling is assigned as reversible error. The demurrer was directed to the absence of any allegation in the complaint showing nonpayment of the note. The only statement purporting to constitute such allegation is "that defendant has refused, and still refuses, to pay the same." That a party suing upon a contract to pay money must allege a breach thereof—that is, nonpayment of the money which he seeks to recover—otherwise his complaint is subject to general demurrer for failure to state a cause of action, is fundamental, and must be conceded. The question presented is whether the statement above quoted constitutes a sufficient allegation of such fact, when tested by general demurrer. While respondent concedes the complaint to be defective, he insists there is not a total lack of essential allegation, and that such defect is cured by the judgment.

[2] We conceive the rule to be that, where the statement, though defective, is in the form of a conclusion, or is of a character from which the fact of nonpayment is implied, it is sufficient when measured by general demurrer. In such case the attack must be made by special demurrer, pointing out the defect. Thus, while there are authorities in this state to the contrary, it has been held that, in the absence of special demurrer, a complaint based upon contract and alleging a breach thereof by stating the sum demanded was due and owing contains a sufficient allegation of nonpayment. Stewart v. Burbridge, 10 Cal. App. 623, 102 Pac. 962; Penrose v. Winter, 135 Cal. 289, 67 Pac. 772. See, also, Knox v. Buckman Contracting Co., 139 Cal. 598, 73 Pac. 428, and cases there cited. The words "due and owing," while a mere conclusion, nevertheless imply a debt matured, and therefore a breach by reason of its nonpayment, and, unless the defect be pointed out by special demurrer, it is cured by verdict or judgment. No conclusion, however, of nonpayment is implied from the allegation that "defendant has refused, and still refuses, to pay," etc. It is impossible to construe such statement as an allegation of nonpayment of a matured indebtedness. Indeed, the alleged refusal of defendant to pay the note is consistent with the prior payment thereof. Since failure to pay constitutes the breach, the complaint must, in order to state a cause of action, negative payment. This rule is too firmly established in this state to be disregarded in order to meet the exigencies of a particular case. The court erred in overruling the general demurrer interposed.

[3] The only defense interposed to the action upon the note was stated in a cross-complaint filed by defendant, wherein she alleged that she had the mothering care and custody of a child which John Leggett and wife expressed a wish to take, receive, care for, and maintain, and that she was anxious to surrender the child to them in compliance with such expressed wish and desire, but that plaintiff, with whom she advised, counseled her against so doing, and agreed that, if she would keep the child and continue to care for and support it, he would compensate her therefor; that, in reliance upon such promise, she retained and continued to care for and support said child, the reasonable value of such care and support of which was $1,800.

The evidence offered under the allegations of the cross-complaint conclusively showed that the child was that of defendant, born to her while living in lawful wedlock with her husband, George Lowry, with whom, so far as shown by the record, she continued to live during all the times in question. It does not appear that her husband, the father of the child, was a party to the alleged agreement, or that he was willing or would have consented, had plaintiff not made the alleged promise, to surrender the care and custody of the child to the Leggetts in accordance with their expressed wish to take and adopt it. So far as shown by the record, he was ignored in the matter. At the close of plaintiff's evidence the court instructed the jury to bring in a verdict for plaintiff, and defendant assigns such ruling as error.

The contention of cross-complainant is that the alleged promise of plaintiff to compensate the mother for supporting her own child constitutes a valid contract, the consideration therefor being the refusal of the mother to avail herself of an opportunity to get a stranger to assume the burden. Section 197, Civil Code, provides that:

> "The father of a legitimate unmarried minor child is entitled to its custody, services, and earnings; but he cannot transfer such custody or services to any other person, except the mother, without her written consent, unless she has deserted him, or is living separate from him by agreement. If the father be dead, or be unable, or refuse to take the custody, or has abandoned his family, the mother is entitled thereto."

There is no evidence establishing any of the conditions under which the mother could deprive the father of the custody, services, and earnings of his son by giving the child to John Leggett and wife. The father being entitled to its custody, the mother had no right and could not, in the absence of the father's consent, transfer the custody, care, and services of the child to a stranger. That which she refrained from doing in consideration of plaintiff's promise was the nonperformance of an act which, under the law, she could not do. Moreover, the law imposes upon parents the duty of caring for, maintaining, and supporting their children, and that which defendant did in consideration of plaintiff's promise is exactly that which, under the law, and independent of the agreement, she was bound to do.

> "Any prejudice suffered, * * * other than such as he is at the time of consent lawfully bound to suffer, * * * is a good consideration for a promise." Section 1605, Civ. Code.

The agreement on the part of defendant to suffer the burden which the law imposed upon her of looking after and caring for her child constituted no valid consideration for the alleged contract made with defendant.

[4] Aside from the fact that there was no sufficient consideration for the contract, to enforce an agreement of this character would, in our opinion, contravene public policy. There was no error in giving the instruction of which defendant complains.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions that the trial court sustain defendant's demurrer to the complaint and grant plaintiff leave to amend his complaint, if the court be so advised.

McRAE v. PINE et al. (Civ. 1619.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Oct. 9, 1914.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 55*)—ORDINANCES—UNIFORM OPERATION—LICENSES.

The constitutional requirement of uniformity in operation of all laws of a general nature does not apply to ordinances enacted in pursuance of a legitimate exercise of the police power, as one in regard to granting liquor licenses, where courts will interfere only for manifest unjust discrimination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 71, 72; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 10*)—LICENSES—POWER OF COUNTY BOARD.

As under Const. art. 11, § 11, providing that any county may make and enforce such local police regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, a county board may prohibit generally the carrying on of the liquor business, so it, by refusing to grant a license, may prohibit it in a certain precinct, unless an ordinance prevents it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 7–12; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 40*)—LICENSES—COUNTY ORDINANCE.

The provision of a county ordinance that the county board shall not grant a liquor license, unless, at the last election on the question of granting licenses, the majority vote in the precinct for which the license is sought was in favor of granting them, does not prevent the board, notwithstanding such a vote, from refusing in its discretion, a license for such precinct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 34; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 70*)—LICENSES—HEARING BY COUNTY BOARD—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

A county board in its hearing on an application for a liquor license for a certain precinct may take judicial notice of the geographical location and surroundings of the precinct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 68–70, 72; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

5. MANDAMUS (§ 154*)—PETITION—CONCLUSION.

The statement in the petition for mandamus that the action of the county board in refusing application for a liquor license was arbitrary and without cause is petitioner's conclusion or opinion, not to be accepted as a statement of fact, unless the statement of actual facts necessarily supports it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 296–316; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 74*)—ISSUANCE OF LICENSE—"MANDAMUS"—DISCRETION.

The writ not being wholly one of right, but largely of judicial discretion, mandamus to a county board to issue a liquor license will be refused, where it could be granted only on a technical construction of an ordinance, contrary to the spirit of the law, which intends such matters shall remain in the power of regulation by the county through its authorized officers.

Application of Al McRae for mandamus to Samuel Pine and others. Petition denied.

G. M. Pittman, of San Bernardino, for petitioner. R. B. Goodcell, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In this proceeding the petioner seeks to obtain a writ of mandate requiring the board of supervisors of the county of San Bernardino to issue to him a license to carry on the business of a retail liquor establishment in the town of Daggett, Daggett voting precinct, in that county.

Ordinance No. 110 of the county of San Bernardino is an ordinance regulating and providing for the licensing of various kinds of business. It is provided that, before a license may issue for carrying on the business of a retail liquor establishment, as defined in the ordinance, an application shall be filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors. It is required that after the publication of certain notices the board of supervisors "shall thereupon proceed to hear any testimony offered, either in support of or against such application for license, and may refuse to allow a license to issue thereunder, if, on such hearing, it shall appear to the satisfaction of the board * * * that in the judgment of said board it would not be for the welfare of the people residing in said precinct or of the county to have the business mentioned in said application carried on in such precinct, * * * or that there is any other sufficient reason for such refusal, whether shown by protest on file, location of business or otherwise." "No application for either a wholesale or retail liquor license shall be granted, unless the application shows that, at the last general election at which the question of granting retail and wholesale liquor licenses was submitted to the vote of the people in the county of San Bernardino, a majority of the votes cast upon the question in the voting precinct in which the business is to be carried on, was in favor of the granting of retail and wholesale liquor license."

This case is submitted for decision upon a general demurrer to the petition, with the understanding that, after ruling upon the demurrer, the court shall proceed to a judgment on the merits by either granting or refusing the peremptory writ demanded by the petition. The petition shows that the petitioner duly presented his application to the clerk of the board of supervisors and the required notices were given. The matter came regularly before the board of supervisors and a hearing was had as hereinafter stated. At the last general election preceding the filing of said application a majority of the votes cast in Daggett voting precinct upon the question of granting retail and wholesale liquor licenses was in favor of the granting thereof. At the hearing of petitioner's application before the board no evidence whatever was offered against said application for the license; nevertheless the board of supervisors rejected the application, and still refuse to grant the same. In taking such action the board of supervisors took no exception whatever to the form, substance, or sufficiency of the application, or to the personal character or standing in the community of the petitioner. Petitioner was a fit and proper person to be granted a license for the purpose of carrying on the business of a retail liquor establishment. These being the facts, the petitioner alleges that the action of the board was purely arbitrary, and entirely without cause, and was not in the exercise of any right conferred on the board by ordinance, and was without lawful right or authority. A stipulation has been filed that a certain copy of portions of the minutes of the board of supervisors pertinent to the issues raised herein may be considered as a part of petitioner's petition. These minutes show that, when the application was taken up for hearing and consideration, no testimony was offered against the issuance of the license. Al McRae, the applicant, was duly sworn and examined, "and gave testimony in favor of the issuance of said license in accordance with the terms of said application." No further testimony was given, and thereupon the board denied the application "upon the ground that, in the judgment of this board, it would not be for the welfare of the people residing within said Daggett voting precinct or of the county to have the business mentioned in said application—to wit, the business of a retail liquor establishment—carried on in said Daggett voting precinct."

[1, 2] That there is a difference between the legal obligation to issue licenses (where such licenses are provided for as a condition to carrying on business) for the carrying on of ordinary commercial occupations and the obligation to issue such licenses for the business here in question is not to be denied. There is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicating liquors. "It is only a calling not in any way injurious to the community which every one has a right to pursue. That the legislative power may prohibit a traffic by retail of intoxicating liquors is conceded. If the governing power can prohibit a thing altogether, it may impose such conditions upon its existence as it pleases, even arbitrary ones. The constitutional requirement with reference to uniformity in operation of all laws of a general nature has no application to ordinances enacted in pursuance of a legitimate exercise of the police power, and only when it is manifest that there is an unjust discrimination do courts interfere." In re Kidd, 5 Cal. App. 159, 89 Pac. 987; In re Cutting, 17 Cal. App. 604, 121 Pac. 304. Under article 11, § 11, of the Constitution of California, any county, city, town, or township has the right to wholly prohibit the carrying on of this business. Ex parte Campbell, 74 Cal. 20, 15 Pac. 318, 5 Am. St. Rep. 418; Reed v. Collins, 5 Cal. App. 494, 498, 90 Pac. 973. The power to prohibit the business includes the power and right to regulate by the imposition of conditions and restrictions. The determination of the places in the county where such business may or may not be carried on is a legal mode of restriction. These rules or principles being established, it follows that the board of supervisors might legally prohibit the proposed business of petitioner in Daggett precinct, unless by the said ordinance the board has established a local law which prevents it from exercising that authority.

[3] The paragraph above quoted from the ordinance would prevent the granting of a license to petitioner if a majority of the votes cast upon the question in Daggett voting precinct had been against the granting of such licenses. But it does not follow that a vote in favor of granting such licenses has imposed on the board of supervisors any duty to grant the license applied for, or has interfered with the discretion lodged in it by law to regulate and restrict the business within the county and at any and all places within the county. The sole object of the provision for a vote by the people of the precinct was that the people might have an opportunity to effectively protest against and prohibit the business in those precincts where a majority of the voters consider that the maintenance of such business is injurious to them. So far as the people of the locality are concerned, the local option clause of the ordinance gives nothing more than a power of veto against the business.

[4, 5] Turning now to the provisions of the ordinance first above quoted, we find that, notwithstanding the absence of any other objection, the board of supervisors may refuse to allow the license, "if on such hearing it shall appear to the satisfaction of the board * * * that in the judgment of said board it would not be for the welfare of the people residing in said precinct or of the county to have the business mentioned in said application carried on in such precinct, * * * or that there is any other sufficient reason for such refusal, whether shown by protest on file, location of business, or otherwise." On the record here presented, we are unable to say that the action of the board was without some sufficient reason arising out of the "location of business or otherwise." As before stated, it appears that at the hearing before the board of supervisors the applicant "was duly sworn and examined, and gave testimony in favor of the issuance of said license in accordance with the terms of said application." This does not necessarily mean that all of the facts elicited by his testimony were such facts as necessarily compelled the exercise of the board's discretion in favor of the granting of the license. The geographical location and surroundings of Daggett precinct are matters of which the board may take judicial notice. The examination of the applicant may have included a cross-examination which may have developed facts unfavorable to the granting of the license. Petitioner's allegation that the action of the board in refusing his petition was purely arbitrary and entirely without cause is a statement of his conclusion or opinion, and is not to be accepted as a statement of fact, unless the statement of actual facts necessarily supports that conclusion.

Taking the license ordinance, and considering it in connection with the section of the Constitution to which we have referred, and with the principles of law specially applicable to those kinds of business which are peculiarly subject to police regulation (as is the business of retailing intoxicating liquors), we arrive at the conclusion that the said ordinance was not intended to, and does not, take away from the board of supervisors its right to refuse to grant a license for such business in any location where, after considering the facts, it is the judgment of the board that the business should not be located in that place.

[6] "The writ of mandamus is not wholly a writ of right, but lies, to a considerable extent, within the sound judicial discretion of the court where the application is made; * * * and no court should allow a writ of mandamus to compel a technical compliance with the letter of the law, where such compliance will violate the spirit of the law." State v. Commissioners of Phillips County, 26 Kan. 419, quoted with approval in Wiedwald v. Dodson, 95 Cal. 450, 454, 30 Pac. 580. Under the circumstances here shown, the writ of mandate applied for by the petitioner could not be granted except upon a technical construction in his favor of the ordinance in question, contrary to the spirit of the law, which intends that such matters shall remain within the power of regulation of the county through its authorized officers.

The petition for the writ is denied.

Application by Rean M. Shoemaker for habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

Beverly L. Hodghead, of San Francisco (C. E. McLaughlin, of Sacramento, of counsel), for petitioner. J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioner is held in custody and restrained of his liberty, at the city of Sacramento, by one Charles H. Harrington, agent of the state of Illinois, under the alleged authority of an executive warrant issued by the Governor of the state of California on a requisition from the Governor of said state of Illinois, authorizing the removal of the petitioner to the latter state to answer to an alleged indictment purporting to charge him with the crimes of conspiracy, larceny, and receiving stolen goods, alleged to have been committed in the city of Chicago, said state of Illinois, on the 8th day of June, 1912.

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is claimed that the petitioner is so restrained of his liberty illegally, and his release from such restraint is asked through this proceeding on habeas corpus on the following grounds: First. That the alleged indictment accompanying the demand of the Illinois executive for his extradition is void. Second. That it is clearly made to appear that, at the time at which the crimes charged in the indictment are alleged to have been committed, the petitioner was not within the borders of the state of Illinois, and that he is not, therefore, a fugitive from justice.

Our conclusion is that the petitioner must be ordered discharged from his present restraint on the ground that the record before us clearly discloses that he was not in the state of Illinois at the time of the alleged commission of the crimes charged in the indictment. It will therefore be unnecessary to consider the point involving the challenge of the sufficiency of the indictment.

The source of the power of interstate extradition is to be found in article 4, § 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which reads:

> "A person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled be delivered up to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime."

For the proper execution of said provision, Congress passed an act, providing:

> "Whenever the executive authority of any state or territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any state or territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any state or territory, charging the person demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the state or territory from whence the person so charged has fled, it shall be the duty of the executive of the state or territory to which such person has fled to cause him to be arrested and secured, and to cause notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear. If no such agent appears within six months from the time of the arrest, the prisoner may be discharged. All costs or expenses incurred in the apprehending, securing, and transmitting of such fugitive to the state or territory making such demand, shall be paid by such state or territory." U. S. Rev. St. § 5278, (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 10126.)

[1] No question is raised here of the right of the courts, in a habeas corpus proceeding, to go beyond the executive warrant in a case of this character and examine and determine the question of the sufficiency of the papers upon which the executive has acted in complying with the demand of the demanding state or territory. That the courts may make full inquiry into such proceedings for the purpose of ascertaining and determining whether the executive warrant has, without legal justification, been issued, is firmly settled by a long line of decisions. For instance, in the case of Jones v. Leonard, 50 Iowa, 110, 32 Am. Rep. 116, it is said:

> "The Governor of this state is not clothed with judicial powers, and there is no provision of the Constitution or laws of the United States or of this state, which provides that his determination is final and conclusive in the case of the extradition of the citizen. In the absence of such a provision, we hold that the decision of the Governor only makes a prima facie case; that it is competent for the courts, in a proceeding of this character, to inquire into the correctness of his decision, and discharge the prisoner."

[2] While some of the cases hold (and we think properly) that, where the evidence adduced before the Governor upon the question whether the prisoner whose extradition is sought is a fugitive from justice of the demanding state is in substantial conflict, the finding of the executive that he is such fugitive will not be set aside by the courts, nevertheless no doubt has ever been entertained that such question of fact is a subject which may be reviewed by the courts and upon which the prisoner may be discharged from custody if it be made to appear that he was not within the borders of the demanding state at practically the precise time at which the alleged crime upon which he is proposed to be extradited was committed. This proposition necessarily follows from the essential conditions upon which alone the executive of one state is authorized to comply with the request of the executive of another state or territory that a citizen or resident of the former state be surrendered to the jurisdiction of the latter, there to undergo trial for a public offense against the laws of the demanding state. As is said by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 6 Sup. Ct. 291, 29 L. Ed. 544, in considering the question of the right of the Governor to recognize and honor a requisition for the extradition of a resident of his state and to issue his warrant thereon:

> "It must appear, therefore, to the Governor of the state to whom such a demand is presented, before he can lawfully comply with it: First, that the person demanded is substantially charged with a crime against the laws of the state from whose justice he is alleged to have fled, by an indictment or an affidavit, certified or authenticated by the Governor of the state making the demand; and, second, that the person demanded is a fugitive from the justice of the state the executive authority of which makes the demand. The first of these prerequisites is a question of law, and is always open upon the face of the papers to judicial inquiry, on an application for a discharge under a writ of habeas corpus."

As to the second prerequisite, which involves a question of fact, the court deemed it unnecessary to go further than to say:

> "How far his (the executive's) decision may be reviewed judicially in proceedings on habeas corpus, or whether it is not conclusive, are questions not settled by harmonious judicial decisions, nor by any authoritative judgment of this court. It is conceded that the determination of the fact by the executive of the state in issuing his warrant of arrest, upon a demand made on that ground, whether the writ contains a recital of an express finding to that effect or not, must be regarded as sufficient to justify the removal until the presumption in its favor is overthrown by contrary proof."

It will be observed that in that case the court in effect holds that the judicial review of proof offered in rebuttal of the prima facie showing involved in the finding of the executive that the prisoner is a fugitive from the justice of the demanding state will be made, and that, if thereupon it is considered sufficient to overthrow the presumption arising from the decision of the Governor that the prisoner is such fugitive, he will be discharged on habeas corpus. And we are unable to understand how the rule could be otherwise and be just. It is, indeed, a necessary corollary of the second prerequisite as stated in the above opinion and without the existence and showing of which the Governor would be without legal authority to comply with the request of the demanding state for the removal of the alleged fugitive to the latter state. Indeed, if it is proper to review the action of the executive so far as is concerned the question of the sufficiency of the indictment or affidavits to disclose that a crime has been committed, then there is no reason why it is not competent for the courts to review the question whether the decision of the Governor that the prisoner is a fugitive from the justice of the demanding state is well founded or justified. The one prerequisite is as necessary and important as the other. The papers might clearly show that a crime had been committed—that is, they might, both in substance and form and with proper legal precision, state a public offense under the laws of the demanding state —and yet the evidence might be either clearly wanting in a showing that the prisoner was in the demanding state when the alleged crime was committed or affirmatively show beyond a reasonable doubt or even by a marked preponderance of the evidence that he was not in such state at that time. As we understand from counsel in this case, the Governor of this state had some doubt as to whether both the propositions upon which the prisoner relies here for his release, said propositions having been urged before the executive, were or were not legally sound, but conceived that, since it is not strictly within the scope of the duties of the executive head of the government to judicially review and determine purely legal questions, it were better that the legal aspects of the proceedings here be remitted to the courts for their consideration and decision—a very proper view, we think. But, speaking generally, it is to be remarked that if the courts were confined in their review of the action of the Governor in cases of this character to the consideration and determination alone of the question of the legal sufficiency in any respect of the papers—the indictment or affidavits—to state a public offense, if, in other words, the courts were to be concluded by the decision of the executive upon the question whether the prisoner was in fact a fugitive from the justice of the demanding state, it could easily be understood how a citizen or resident of one state could, without a satisfactory showing or upon virtually no showing at all that he had fled from the state requesting his removal thereto, be taken from his own state and transported to another, there to be subjected to a trial for a crime with which he had and could have had no connection whatsoever.

But it appears to be now quite generally conceded that, as the executive, before he can authorize the extradition of a resident of his state to another for trial on a criminal charge, must be shown by competent proof that the person whose extradition is sought is a fugitive from the justice of the demanding state, it is within the legal competence of the courts to review the action of the executive in that respect and to discharge the prisoner if it be found and determined that the exercise of the executive authority, so far as that fact is concerned, was predicated upon insufficient proof of said fact, or in the presence of evidence offered by the prisoner which should be held to be sufficient to destroy the force of the prima facie showing by the state upon that point.

In People ex rel. McNichols v. Pease, 207 U. S. 100, 28 Sup. Ct. 58, 52 L. Ed. 121, Mr. Justice Harlan, voicing the views of the court, after declaring that a warrant of extradition in itself made out a prima facie case that the prisoner was a fugitive from justice of the demanding state and that the warrant could be reviewed on habeas corpus, said:

> "One arrested and held as a fugitive from justice is entitled, of right, upon habeas corpus, to question the lawfulness of his arrest and imprisonment, showing by competent evidence, as a ground for his release, that he was not, within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States, a fugitive from the justice of the demanding state, and thereby overcoming the presumption to the contrary arising from the face of an extradition warrant."

And it has been held that, although the evidence upon the question whether the prisoner was absent or present in the demanding state when the crime charged against him was committed is conflicting, if, nevertheless, the court is convinced from the whole record that the fact that he is a fugitive from justice has not been satisfactorily shown, the prisoner will be discharged. People v. McLaughlin, 145 App. Div. 513, 130 N. Y. Supp. 458, 464.

[3] There is no merit in the contention of the Attorney General in the case at bar that the question whether the petitioner was or was not in the state of Illinois when the crime for which his extradition is requested by the latter state cannot be reviewed upon habeas corpus because it involves the question of his guilt or innocence of said crime; that is, that by this proceeding he thus attempts to set up an alibi, an element which goes directly to the question of his guilt or innocence. The question presented in this proceeding is not whether the petitioner was present at the scene of the alleged crime when it was committed, but whether he was within the borders of the demanding state at the time said crime was committed. Obviously, if he was not in said state at said time, he cannot be a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States authorizing the extradition of fugitives from justice (Hyatt v. Corkran, 188 U. S. 691, 23 Sup. Ct. 456, 47 L. Ed. 657), and, although the investigation of that question necessarily involves the question of alibi, in a proceeding of this character it is a question of overruling importance and is to be considered, as before suggested, not for the purpose or with the view of solving the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused, but solely to determine whether he may lawfully be removed to the demanding state, where, perchance (it may well be suggested), he might be deprived of the privilege or opportunity of establishing an alibi, which might, if proved, exonerate him from the charge, by reason of the fact that witnesses by whom he could show he was not in Illinois when the crime was committed were beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of that state.

Replying, however, to a similar contention urged in the case of People v. McLaughlin, supra, the Supreme Court of New York, upon the authority of a large array of cases therein cited, said:

> "In habeas corpus proceedings (Ryan v. Conlin [15 Misc. Rep. 303], 36 N. Y. Supp. 888) the prisoner gave proof that he was not in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the crime. The court declared that, inasmuch as this proof went to establish an alibi, it was a matter of defense at the trial, and could not be considered on habeas corpus to review the warrant of extradition. The reason given by that court for this conclusion was that it was settled that in proceedings to review a warrant of extradition the guilt or innocence of the prisoner could not be inquired into. Matter of Clark, 9 Wend. [N. Y.] 212. Therefore it is argued, as an alibi is concerned with the question of guilt or innocence, it cannot be considered on habeas corpus. It seems to us that this reasoning is clearly unsound. An 'alibi,' in its general features, consists of proof that the defendant was not at the scene of the crime at the time of its commission. Proof that the prisoner was not in the demanding state at the time of the commission of the crime is necessarily proof that he was not at the scene of the crime. But the question involved in extradition proceedings is not whether the defendant was at the scene of the crime at the time of its commission, but whether he was anywhere within the demanding state when the crime was committed. This latter question had nothing to do with guilt or innocence, but it has all to do with the question whether the prisoner has fled from the demanding state, and is therefore, a fugitive from justice.
> "In the Matter of Clark, ut supra, the presence of the prisoner in the demanding state when the crime was committed was not disputed, and hence the question of alibi was not involved. Before a warrant of extradition can be sustained, it must appear as a jurisdictional fact that the prisoner is a fugitive from justice; that is, it must be shown that he was actually present in the demanding state when the crime was committed. Mere constructive presence is not enough."

The proposition as thus stated is clearly expounded and approved by all the cases. Indeed, if the proposition were not sound, the question whether a person is in fact a fugitive from justice, within the contemplation of the Constitution and laws of the United States authorizing interstate extradition, could never be inquired into by the courts. But, as is well suggested by counsel for the petitioner, to sustain the point as urged by the Attorney General would necessitate the declaration and the conclusion that the many cases heretofore passing upon the question were erroneous in their reasoning and conclusion.

Thus we have stated some of the principles governing the exercise of the power of interstate extradition and by the light of which the facts must and will be considered.

[4] The indictment, a copy of which is annexed to the petition for this writ, alleges that the petitioner committed the crimes therein charged against him on the 8th day of June, 1912, in the county of Cook, in the state of Illinois. In other words, that accusatory pleading, without qualification and unequivocally, fixes the 8th day of June, 1912, as the date of the commission of the crimes of which the petitioner is thus accused, and by neither specific nor general language pretends to fix or allege any other date. It follows that it must clearly appear by competent proof, either direct or circumstantial, the latter, equally with the former, sufficient in evidentiary force to produce conviction of the fact, that the petitioner was in the state of Illinois on the 8th day of June, 1912. If it be not thus satisfactorily shown that he was in said state on said day, then, obviously, one of the two essential prerequisites upon which alone the executive is empowered to issue his warrant of extradition and so authorize the removal of the petitioner to the state of Illinois is wanting or not shown to exist, and the prisoner would therefore be entitled to be released from a restraint which, if not intercepted, would ultimately lead to the unlawful removal of his person to another state.

[5] First, it is to be remarked that, manifestly, the indictment itself or the fact that thus the petitioner is charged with having committed certain crimes in the demanding state constitutes, if any at all, very remote evidence of flight or of the fact that the accused is a fugitive from justice. A person may be a principal in the commission of a crime and not be present at the scene thereof at the time of its commission. As a concrete example, one might plan the crime of murder in California, to be committed in the state of New York by his confederates, he remaining and being in the former state at the time of its commission. While he would be a principal in the commission of said crime and could be indicted in New York for it, and the courts of that state have the power or legal right to try and punish him therefor, if ever he came within their jurisdiction, still he would not be a fugitive from justice under the federal constitutional provision and laws establishing the authority for interstate extradition.

[6] Now, as to the proofs in this case: In support of the application for the warrant of extradition, the respondent presented to the executive a number of affidavits which declare that at some other time than the 8th day of June, 1912, the petitioner was in the state of Illinois. The first of these affidavits was made by the state's attorney of Cook county, Ill., and all that he therein declares is that the petitioner fled from said state on or about the 28th day of August, 1912. Another is by one Konekamp, who declares that the petitioner, with certain other persons, conspired with others to steal certain property from affiant, which said property was stolen, in pursuance of said conspiracy, "on or about" the 8th day of June, 1912. One Roderick deposes that he is personally well acquainted with the petitioner, and that "he knows of his own personal knowledge that the said Rean M. Shoemaker was personally present in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, state of Illinois, in the months of May and June, 1912." The dates in those months when he declares he saw Shoemaker were the 21st day of May (18 days prior to the alleged date of the larceny) and the 28th day of June, 1912 (20 days after said date).

The affidavits thus referred to constituted all the evidence presented by the respondent to sustain his application for the warrant of extradition. It will be noted that no pretense is made that any person saw the petitioner or had personal knowledge of his presence in the state of Illinois on the 8th day of June, 1912. So far as is concerned the showing made by the demanding state, the whereabouts of Shoemaker on the said 8th day of June were unknown.

It must be admitted that the presence of the petitioner in the state of Illinois 18 days prior and his presence therein approximately 3 weeks subsequent to the day on which the larceny with which he is charged was committed, even assuming it to be true that he was there on those dates, constituted exceedingly slight, and at best unsatisfactory, circumstances by which the conclusion may be supported that he was in Illinois on the 8th day of June. Those circumstances cannot be said to go any further than to tend to show that he "might" have been in Illinois on the 8th of June. But while this is true, they are at the same time perfectly consistent with the hypothesis that he was not present in said state on said day or the few days immediately preceding and succeeding that date.

Thus it must be seen that the probative facts upon which the extradition of the petitioner is requested fall very far short of satisfactorily establishing the all-important ultimate fact that he is a fugitive from the justice of the state of Illinois. But while it may, for the sake of the argument, be conceded that the testimony thus presented, considered in connection with the conclusion stated in the affidavit of the state's attorney that the petitioner "is a fugitive from the justice" of the state of Illinois, is sufficient to make out a prima facie case on that score, it is quite obvious that but a slight adversary showing by the petitioner would suffice utterly to destroy whatever probative value it might possess, standing alone or unchallenged. But the petitioner has made more than a slight showing in rebuttal. The testimony presented by him is direct and positive.

The affidavit of the petitioner's wife, Alice L. Shoemaker, declares that she and her husband resided in California from the month of September, 1902, to December 8, 1911, on which latter date they removed temporarily to the city of New York, where they resided until the 22d day of August, 1912.

> "On the latter date, in company with my husband and family, we left New York for San Francisco, where we arrived on the 28th day of August, 1912, and have been residing in California since the latter date. My husband, the said R. M. Shoemaker, was at home in New York on the 8th day of June, 1912, and was not in the state of Illinois between the 15th day of May, 1912, and the 23d day of August of said year; that on the said 23d day of August we passed through Chicago on the journey from New York to California, and transferred from the Pennsylvania Railway cars to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad at the Union Station, in Chicago."

Fred O. Dille deposes that, from about the 1st day of April to the 30th day of June of the year 1912, he resided with his family in the city of Buffalo, state of New York, and was then in the employ of the Western Union Telegraph Company; that he was in Buffalo on the 8th day of June, 1912; that as such employé he was under the supervision of the petitioner, whose office was then in the city of New York.

> "I recall distinctly and so aver," continues Dille's affidavit, "that on the 8th day of June, 1912, about the hour of 11 o'clock a. m., while in the city of Buffalo, state of New York, I called by long distance telephone at Statler Hotel said R. M. Shoemaker at his office in the city of New York, state of New York, in the usual way, by informing the long distance operator of the telephone line, then operating between said cities, that I desired to speak to said R. M. Shoemaker at his office, at No. 9 John street, city of New York, giving the number of his telephone, and at the said time said R. M. Shoemaker answered said telephone from the said city of New York, and I conversed with him over the telephone at that time and on that date and hour. I am familiar with his voice, and for that reason and from the subject-matter of the conversation I know that it was said Shoemaker who answered the 'phone and was talking to me on said occasion."

The petitioner, in his affidavit, after denying any complicity in or connection with or knowledge of the commission of the crimes charged against him in the indictment, states that he continuously resided in the state of California from the month of September, 1902, to the 8th day of December, 1911, when, with his family, he removed to the city of New York, to remain in said city temporarily; that he was in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, state of Illinois, about the middle of the month of May, 1912, remaining there for a period of two or three days, during which time he lived at the Great Northern Hotel, in said city; that he left Chicago not later than the 21st day of May, 1912, and returned to the city of New York, where he remained until the 22d day of August, 1912, on which day he left New York city with his family and returned by continuous trip to the state of California, where he arrived on the 28th day of August, 1912, and where he has ever since resided; that on said journey from New York to San Francisco he passed through the city of Chicago on the 23d day of August, 1912, and left that city on the same day for Portland, Or., thence immediately to the city of San Francisco; that he was not in the state of Illinois on the 8th day of June, 1912, or at any time in the months of June or July of said year, or at any other time or times during said year, except in the months of May and August, as above stated.

From the foregoing, which constitutes a statement in substance of the proofs submitted by the petitioner, the conclusion is inevitable that the petitioner was not in the state of Illinois on the 8th day of June, 1912, or at any time within two weeks of that date. In this declaration we assume that the testimony presented by the petitioner is to be given full credence, and why not, under the circumstances? As shown, the respondent nowhere declares or pretends to say that the petitioner was in said state on the day when the crimes are alleged to have been committed, and it follows therefore that there is no direct proof upon that question save that which comes from the petitioner. If the state had produced affidavits declaring in positive and unequivocal language that the petitioner was in Illinois on the said 8th day of June, a situation precluding a judicial review of the decision of the executive might then be presented, notwithstanding that the proofs presented before the Governor were, as is true here, by affidavits. But the situation confronting us is such that either we must give full weight to the proofs adduced by the petitioner or hold that from such proofs, there being, practically, no showing by the respondent justifying a contrary view, there at least arises so grave a doubt of the presence of the petitioner within the boundaries of the state of Illinois on the date of the alleged commission of the crimes charged in the indictment as to generate and support the conviction that, to lend judicial sanction to his removal under such circumstances, would involve an unlawful and wrongful menace to and invasion of his inalienable constitutional rights.

It is true, as a general proposition, that upon the trial of one charged with crime it is not required that the people shall prove, in order to sustain a conviction, that such crime was committed at the precise date specified in the indictment. The general rule at the trial is that, although the crime may be alleged to have been committed on a specific date, proof that the crime was committed on some date within the period beyond which the prosecution of one charged with the crime would be barred by the statute of limitations, would be sufficient, and a conviction upon such proof, so far as that fact was concerned, properly upheld. But there is no analogy between that proposition and the one here, where, to constitute him a fugitive from justice, it is indispensably necessary to show that the person whose extradition is sought was in the demanding state at the exact time of the commission of the offense with which he is here charged. As is said in the case of Hyatt v. Corkran, 188 U. S. 691, 23 Sup. Ct. 456, 47 L. Ed. 657:

> "That the prosecution on the trial of such an indictment need not prove with exactness the commission of the crime at the very time alleged in the indictment is immaterial. The indictments in this case named certain dates as the times when the crimes were committed, and where in a proceeding like this there is no proof, or offer of proof, to show that the crimes were in truth committed on some other day than those named in the indictments, and that the dates therein named were erroneously stated, it is sufficient for the party charged to show that he was not in the state at the times named in the indictments; and when those facts are proved so that there is no dispute in regard to them, and there is no claim of any error in the dates named in the indictments, the facts so proved are sufficient to show that the person was not in the state when the crimes were, if ever, committed. * * * It is difficult to see how a person can be said to have fled from the state in which he is charged to have committed some act amounting to a crime against that state, when in fact he was not within the state at the time the act is said to have been committed. How can a person flee from a place that he was not in? He could avoid a place that he had not been in; he could omit to go to it; but how can it be said with accuracy that he has fled from a place in which he had not been present? This is neither a narrow, nor, as we think, an incorrect, interpretation of the statute. It has been in existence since 1793, and we have found no case decided by this court wherein it has been held that the statute covered a case where the party was not in the state at the time when the act is alleged to have been committed. We think the plain meaning of the act requires such presence, and that it was not intended to include, as a fugitive from the justice of a state, one who had not been in the state at the time when, if ever, the offense was committed, and who had not therefore in fact fled therefrom."

From the foregoing considerations, we are persuaded that it is our duty to discharge the prisoner from the custody of the agent of the state of Illinois and from the consequent restraint of his person, and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

CHIPMAN, P. J. [7] In an opinion filed September 30, 1914, in the above-entitled cause, by Mr. Justice HART, speaking for the court, the facts and the law were very fully gone into, and the conclusion reached was that the prisoner should be discharged, and it was so ordered. 19 Cal. App. Dec. 470. We are now asked to grant a rehearing upon the ground that:

> "This case, if permitted to stand under the present decision, will be of far-reaching importance as a precedent throughout the states of the Union, and it is highly important that the greatest measure of opportunity of full discussion of every possible feature of the law should be granted."

Some authorities not called to our attention at the argument of the case are cited in the petition, but we cannot see that they cast additional light upon the questions involved. However this may be, we should feel inclined, out of abundant caution, to grant the petition were there not an insuperable objection in view of the nature of the case and the decisions of the Supreme Court upon the question of a right to a rehearing.

In Ex parte Robinson, 71 Cal. 611, 12 Pac. 795, Robinson petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus and, after due hearing, he was remanded by order of the court. He filed a petition for rehearing and, in refusing to consider his petition, the court made the following order:

> "The Court. Petition for rehearing denied. There is no practice here allowing petitions for rehearing in cases of habeas corpus."

Ex parte Williams was a habeas corpus case decided by this court in July, 1906, and the petitioner was discharged. 7 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 301, 87 Pac. 565. He applied to the Supreme Court for a hearing in that court, under the provisions of article 6, § 4, of the Constitution. The petition was denied.

> "Per Curiam. The application for an order transferring the above-entitled cause from the District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court for hearing and determination after judgment in the said district court of appeal is denied; a majority of the justices of this court being of the opinion that the constitutional provision with reference to the transfer of cases from the District Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court has no application in matters of habeas corpus."

In Ex parte Zany, 164 Cal. 724, 130 Pac. 710, a petition was filed in this court for a writ of habeas corpus and denied. 20 Cal. App. 360, 129 Pac. 295. Zany petitioned the Supreme Court to have the cause there heard as was done in the Williams Case, supra. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Angellotti, Justice Shaw alone dissenting, again held that "it had no power to transfer in habeas corpus proceedings." The question was fully examined, the provision of the Constitution carefully analyzed, and the reasons very clearly given for denying the right. It seems to us that the full force of the reasoning is equally applicable where a rehearing is sought in this court, after it has either remanded or discharged the petitioner.

The contention of the Attorney General is that since the decision of the Supreme Court in the Robinson Case, supra, the law has been changed so that the petitioner may be admitted to bail pending the hearing, and hence, the question of his present liberty being no longer involved, he is deprived of no right if after the order of his discharge the court should retain the power and exercise it to the extent of ordering a rehearing on the application of the people.

Both the Williams Case and the Zany Case were decided since the law was so changed as to allow a petitioner to give bail for his appearance pending the hearing on his petition for the writ. The question is whether, under the provisions of the Constitution creating the District Court of Appeal, its judgment in habeas corpus cases is to be regarded the same as its judgments in mandamus, certiorari, and prohibition, which latter, as has been held, do not become final until "the expiration of 30 days after the same shall have been pronounced." Noel v. Smith, 2 Cal. App. 158, 83 Pac. 167.

In Dawson v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 73, 110 Pac. 479, it was held that in prohibition cases the judgment of a District Court of Appeal may be transferred to the Supreme Court for reconsideration and decision.

The Constitution provides as follows:

> "The said court (District Court of Appeal) shall also have power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus. * * * The supreme court shall have power to order any cause pending * * * before a District Court of Appeal to be heard and determined by the supreme court. The order last mentioned may be made before judgment has been pronounced by a District Court of Appeal, or within thirty days after such judgment shall have become final therein. The judgments of the District Courts of Appeal shall become final therein upon the expiration of thirty days after the same shall have been pronounced." Const. art. 6, § 4.

The Attorney General contends that a judgment of the District Court of Appeal in a habeas corpus case, so far as concerns its finality, does not differ from a judgment in mandamus or prohibition. If it is final in the sense that judgments in prohibition and mandamus cases are final, it must follow that, as in these latter cases, it may be reconsidered in this court before the expiration of 30 days from its rendition and by the Supreme Court before the expiration of 60 days, as are the other cases mentioned. But the Supreme Court, in the Zany Case, supra, distinctly held that the provision of the Constitution declaring that "the judgments of the District Courts of Appeal shall become final therein upon the expiration of thirty days after the same shall have been pronounced" is not applicable to habeas corpus proceedings. Attention is invited to the full discussion of the question and the reasons given for its decision by the Supreme Court, which we do not deem it necessary to here repeat.

It will be observed that the Supreme Court says that:

> "A habeas corpus proceeding cannot fairly be said to be so 'pending' at any time after judgment by such court. Such a proceeding is finally and definitely ended by the judgment, and, if the petitioner be ordered discharged thereby, he is at once restored to liberty."

If, then, our judgment, in this class of cases, remanding the petitioner, is of such nature that he may at once have relief by an original petition to the Supreme Court for a writ without waiting the expiration of 60 days, we can see no reason why our judgment discharging the petitioner should in effect be suspended for 30 days with the right on the part of the respondent during that period to demand a rehearing in this court. The provision of the Constitution under which this right is now claimed must be held to apply equally to a judgment of discharge as well as to a judgment remanding the petitioner. The very object of the Constitution was to give opportunity to have the judgments of the District Courts of Appeal reconsidered by the Supreme Court. But as habeas corpus cases, as has been decided by the Supreme Court, are not of the class which may be thus reconsidered, it would seem to follow that a proceeding of this nature, as the Supreme Court has also decided, "is finally and definitely ended by the judgment," whether it be a judgment denying or granting the writ.

We attach no special significance to the fact that the petitioner may now be allowed to give bail for his appearance pending the hearing of his application. The object of the writ is to test the legality of his restraint and until he is discharged he cannot be said to be at liberty, and when discharged we do not think there is any provision of law, and certainly no rule of practice, whereby he may again be brought before the court and compelled to show cause why the order discharging him should not be vacated and his petition reheard. The object of the writ is not merely to relieve the petitioner from present physical restraint, but from all restraint which is being imposed upon him by his illegal detention. Church on Habeas Corpus, § 87.

We have exercised the power to grant rehearings, in ordinary cases, upon petition filed within the 30 days mentioned in the Constitution, and would probably vacate a judgment upon our own motion within that time if we thought an error had been committed. But we have no such power under the Constitution after our judgments have become final; the only source of relief then open to a party is by petition to the Supreme Court under the rules of that court. Paragraph 3, rule 30 (119 Pac. xiv). As we have seen, neither the provisions of the Constitution nor the rules of the Supreme Court apply to habeas corpus cases. It hence follows that we cannot grant a rehearing in such cases.

The petition is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Condemnation by the Colusa & Hamilton Railroad Company against Charles H. Glenn and others. From an order granting plaintiff a new trial after judgment of condemnation and assessment of damages, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 144 Pac. 994.

Ben Geis, of Willows, for appellants. Frank Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was to condemn a right of way 100 feet wide and comprising altogether 12.13 acres of land. The jury found that the value of the said strip was the sum of $250 per acre at the time of the issuance of the summons, or a total of $3,032.50; that the damages to the larger tract of which said strip formed a part by reason of its severance and the construction of the railroad was the sum of $41,400; and that the cost of the necessary fences would be the sum of $1,900, making a total award of $46,332.50. Thereafter findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a preliminary order for condemnation were duly signed and filed by the trial court. In due time plaintiff gave notice of its intention to move for a new trial on all the statutory grounds, and the court made the following order:

> "Plaintiff having heretofore moved for a new trial in this cause, and the same having been argued, submitted, and taken under advisement by the court, and the court having considered the matter and being fully advised in the premises, hereby grants said motion for a new trial, and it is so ordered on the ground that the amount awarded defendant by the jury as damages is excessive."

From this order the appeal is taken.

[1, 2] It would be an utter waste of time and effort to consider the appeal at length as the case comes clearly within the well-established principle that when evidence is conflicting the granting or refusing of a new trial rests peculiarly in the discretion of the court below, and that the appellate court will interfere only in case of a plain abuse of such discretion, and, furthermore, that the party alleging error must show the abuse of discretion. Hall v. Bark "Emily Banning," 33 Cal. 525. The same rule applies to condemnation proceedings as to other civil actions. San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604.

[3, 4] The evidence here was essentially, emphatically, and irreconcilably conflicting, as shown by the testimony set forth in respondent's brief, with the repetition of which we deem it unnecessary to burden the record. There is nothing to indicate that in the order complained of the court abused its discretion. On the contrary, we must assume that the court acted in good faith upon the conviction that the verdict was unjust, and it must be said that an inspection of the record discloses legal justification for that conviction.

One of the important controverted questions of the trial, to which brief attention will be given, related to probable damages from flood waters that might be held on the severed tract by reason of the construction of plaintiff's proposed railroad. The consideration was suggested by this interrogatory:

> "Would the construction of the railroad as proposed and testified to, cause flood waters of the Sacramento river, when they reach the proposed constructed railroad, to hold the waters back upon the lands of Charles Glenn that would not be held if the railroad wasn't there, or wasn't built in accordance with the proposed plan as testified to?"

This was followed by a question whether thereby damage would be caused to the land of said Glenn not sought to be taken. The court at first sustained an objection to each of these questions, but afterwards changed its ruling and held that such evidence is admissible. The court stated its reasons for so holding, citing many decisions in support of its opinion.

We may refer to only one of these cases in which the rule is undoubtedly correctly stated. In Blunck v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 142 Iowa, 146, 120 N. W. 737, the Supreme Court of Iowa said:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "The rule of damage is the difference between the value of the land immediately before and after the taking of the right of way. * * * The real question in such cases being how much has the market value of the property been diminished by taking the right of way therefrom, it is manifest that in determining and fixing such damages all matters and conditions which may reasonably be expected to follow the location and operation of the road and affect the value of the land should be considered."

Many illustrations of the rule are given in that and other opinions, but we need not reproduce them. If there is a reasonable probability that the construction of plaintiff's railroad as contemplated will augment the damage to the land caused by flood waters, of course, this is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in arriving at a proper award. Whether there is such reasonable probability is a matter of opinion based upon certain physical facts which are detailed by some of the witnesses.

From plaintiff's showing the inference would follow that no probable damage would ensue from this source and that the market value of the land would not be affected by this circumstance. For instance, H. M. Mitchell testified:

> "When the flood waters reach the railroad embankment it would not check its flow. It would deflect the water to the south and change its direction, but it would not hold the waters back at all. The channel, as it now is on the Glenn place, would not be changed. If there was twice as much water held back on the Glenn place east of the railroad right of way, by reason of the construction of the railroad, the channel could not be narrowed, and it would not take any longer for the water to pass off the Glenn place than it does now, for under that assumption it would have four times the velocity and pass off in the same length of time as now. The trestles that we have located on this road will take care of all the water that comes on the Glenn place, no matter where it comes from."

There was expert evidence, however, on behalf of defendant to the effect that the railroad as intended to be constructed would hold back the water on something like 480 acres of land. On this assumption the opinion was expressed that the market value would be greatly depreciated. We are not prepared to say that there was no basis for such opinion.

The matter is, of course, somewhat speculative, depending upon various contingencies; but if thereby the market value of the land is diminished defendant has the right to make proof of it, and there is no available method by which to show this fact except through the opinion of competent witnesses. The inquiry should, of course, be very carefully conducted, and none but qualified witnesses should be allowed to express an opinion for the assistance of the jury. This character of evidence is generally unsatisfactory and often misleading, but as to this point no different proof seems possible.

We think a new trial may be safely intrusted to the discretion of the learned judge of the lower court without any further suggestions.

The order is affirmed.

COLUSA & H. R. CO. v. GLENN et al.

(Civ. No. 1211.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 27, 1914.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Colusa & Hamilton Railroad Company against Charles H. Glenn and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Judgment vacated.

Ben Geis, of Willows, for appellant. Frank Freeman, of Willows, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment taken by plaintiff. As we have this day affirmed the order granting the motion for a new trial (No. 1210, 144 Pac. 993), and the effect of that order was to vacate the judgment, it is unnecessary to make any formal disposition of this appeal.

PEOPLE v. MANDAL. (Cr. 264.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 27, 1914.) Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; N. D. Arnot, Judge. Leo Mandal was convicted of pimping, and he appeals. Affirmed. Martin I. Welsh, of Sacramento, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. On this appeal we have not been favored with any argument, oral or written. Nevertheless we have examined the record, and we find that defendant was properly charged with the offense designated in the statute as "pimping," that sufficient evidence of his guilt was received, and that no prejudicial error was committed during the trial. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TAGGART. (Cr. 263.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 27, 1914.) Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; John L. Childs, Judge. Orville Taggart was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed. E. M. Frost, of Eureka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was convicted by a jury of the crime of rape upon one May Bartol, at the time under the age of consent, and was sentenced to imprisonment for the term of five years. It appears from a fragmentary record sent up to this court that the verdict was rendered on November 12, 1913, and upon the motion of defendant's attorney sentence was postponed from time to time until December 8, 1913. The record of that day reads: "Defendant and attorney in court. Defendant informs court he has no further use for an attorney. E. M. Frost, attorney, makes address to court and retires from case." Passing of sentence was postponed from time to time thereafter until February 24, 1914. It appears that on that day defendant withdrew his motion for a new trial and his plea of not guilty and entered a plea of guilty. Thereupon the court passed sentence upon him. We find in the record what purports to be a notice of appeal from the judgment of February 24, 1914, signed, "E. M. Frost, Attorney for Defendant, and Henry L. Ford, of Counsel, for Defendant," to which is attached an affidavit of service upon the district attorney by mail, and marked, "Filed March 6, 1914. W. L. Nichols, Clerk." No transcript of the phonographic report of the trial has been sent up. There is nothing before the court for review, if it be admitted that an appeal was properly taken, except the minute entries of the trial kept by the clerk and the judgment of conviction. No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

1. Judgment (§§ 670, 739*)—Res Judicata—Identity of Issues and Parties.

It is no bar to assertion against an administrator, on his accounting of claim for use and occupation of land of the estate, that, pending the administration, the heir, asserting title as such, successfully sued to set aside her deed of the land to him; the right of possession until distribution being, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1581, in the administrator so that there could not have been recovery in the action for use and occupation, and, in addition, the action having been against him individually.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David J. Piercy, deceased. From an order settling his account as administrator, Edward M. Piercy appeals, Andrew J. Piercy being the respondent. Affirmed.

See, also, 145 Pac. 91.

Rogers & Bloomingdale, of San Jose, for appellant. John E. Alexander, of San Francisco, and Beasly & Fry and Fry & Jenkins, all of San Jose, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal by Edward M. Piercy from an order settling his account as administrator of the estate of David J. Piercy, deceased.

David J. Piercy died intestate in February, 1901, leaving as his sole heir his mother, Mary Piercy. Edward M. Piercy was appointed administrator of his estate on April 10, 1901. In March, 1901, Mary Piercy executed a deed conveying to Edward the real estate which had descended to her as heir of David. In September, 1903, Mary commenced an action against Edward to set aside this deed on the ground of fraud and undue influence. Judgment was rendered against her, but thereafter, on motion of Andrew J. Piercy, as administrator of her estate (she having died, and said Andrew having been appointed as such administrator and substituted as plaintiff in the action), a new trial was granted. See Piercy v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 163, 86 Pac. 507. On a retrial the plaintiff secured judgment decreeing that the title to the premises in dispute was vested in him as administrator of the estate of Mary. Edward appealed, giving a stay bond in the sum of $10,000 to secure payment of the value of the use and occupation of the premises pending the appeal. The judgment was affirmed; the judgment of affirmance becoming final in June, 1912. Piercy v. Piercy, 18 Cal. App. 751, 124 Pac. 561. Thereupon steps were taken to compel Edward to file an account and to have him removed as administrator. Before these matters had been disposed of, in October, 1912, Edward agreed to turn over the possession of the real estate in controversy, and possession was delivered. A first account theretofore filed had been disallowed. A second was filed on December 12, 1912. This, too, was disallowed, and the letters of administration of Edward were, on January 16, 1913, revoked. Andrew was appointed administrator of the estate of David on January 31, 1913.

On February 15, 1913, Edward filed a third account, which forms the subject of the present controversy. Considerable testimony was introduced. The court announced its conclusion that Edward M. Piercy had, during his possession of the real estate belonging to the estate, used it and conducted it as his own, in conjunction with adjoining property belonging to him; that he had kept no accounts of his use of the estate's property; that he had mingled the proceeds of the estate with his own funds and had used them for his own purposes and benefit; and that it was impossible to ever find out the true state of the affairs of the estate, and what had been received and disbursed in connection therewith. Accordingly, the court announced Edward should be charged with the reasonable rental value of the land of the estate for his use and occupation thereof. That the evidence fully sustains the foregoing statement of the facts shown cannot be disputed, and the appellant does not question the propriety, under this state of facts, of charging him with the rental value of the land, except that he makes the claim—to be considered later—that the judgment in the action instituted against him by Mary Piercy bars such charge. At this stage the court set a day for hearing evidence of rental value. Such evidence was introduced, and the court made an order fixing the rental value of the real property of the estate during the administration of Edward at $1,740 per annum; 300 acres at $3.30 each, and 750 acres at $1 each. Thereafter the order now appealed from was made. By it the court charged Edward with $1,740 per annum from April 10, 1901, to October 8, 1912. It refused the request of the respondent that the appellant be charged with compound interest on these sums, and refused to allow Edward any counsel fees or commissions.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1, 2] The first point urged is that the respondent's claim for the value of the use and occupation of the premises might have been litigated in the action brought by Mary Piercy against the appellant, and that the judgment in that action is therefore a bar to a renewal of the same claim. A sufficient answer to this contention is that the value of the use and occupation could not have been recovered from the appellant in the former action. He was there sued as an individual, claiming title to property which, it was alleged, belonged to Mary Piercy. The substituted plaintiff in that case, as administrator of the estate of Mary Piercy, recovered judgment declaring that she (or her estate) was the owner of the property. But the title asserted by her was that of an heir of the estate of David Piercy. That estate had not been administered. During its administration the heir, although succeeding to the legal title, was not entitled to the possession of the property. Until distribution, the right of possession was in the administrator. Code Civ. Proc. § 1581; Meeks v. Hahn, 20 Cal. 620; Washington v. Black, 83 Cal. 290, 23 Pac. 300. So that, whatever may have been the effect of the former judgment as an adjudication in favor of Mary, and against Edward, that the title was in the former, there could have been no recovery of the value of the use and occupation, for the simple reason that, during the entire pendency of the action, the plaintiff therein was not entitled to the possession of the premises. Furthermore, that action was against Edward M. Piercy as an individual. The judgment could not determine his liability to the estate as administrator, and this is the liability upon which the order now before us is based. The fact that he gave a stay bond, conditioned to pay the value of the use and occupation pending the appeal, did not have the effect of extending the scope, as an adjudication, of the judgment appealed from.

[3, 4] The appellant complains of the refusal of the court to allow him administrator's commissions and counsel fees. The appellant had been succeeded as administrator by Andrew J. Piercy and the administration of the estate remained uncompleted. The former administrator was not, therefore, entitled to the statutory commissions, but, at most, to such part thereof as the court might apportion to him upon a consideration of the respective rights of the successive administrators. Prior to the amendment in 1911 of section 1616 of the Code of Civil Procedure, no such apportionment could be made until the estate had been completely administered and was ready for distribution. Estate of Barton, 55 Cal. 87; In re Levinson, 108 Cal. 456, 41 Pac. 483, 42 Pac. 479. The amended section provides, however, for an application, after the expiration of one year from the grant of letters, for an allowance upon commissions. This provision is applicable to successive administrators. Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 147, 135 Pac. 293.

[5] It does not alter the rule that the statutory commissions are to be paid but once, and are to be apportioned among all the administrators. The appellant did not invoke the power of the court, under the amended section, to make an allowance on account of the commission which would ultimately be payable for the administration as a whole. He simply charged the estate, in his account, with the entire statutory commission. This charge the court refused to allow, and there can be no doubt that it was right in thus refusing. The appellant was clearly not entitled to what he asked, and, if he desired to have the court make a partial allowance on account, he should, in some way, have requested that the court exercise the discretion vested in it by the amended section 1616. This, so far as the record shows, he did not do, and it must accordingly be held that the court did not err in denying the only application made to it. This conclusion is no bar to the right of the appellant to proceed hereafter for a partial allowance under section 1616. The question, much discussed by counsel, whether the misconduct of the appellant as administrator would justify the court in denying him any allowance of commissions need not be here decided. It will remain open for consideration upon any future application that may be made, whether on final distribution or prior thereto. The demand for an allowance for attorney's fees stands upon similar grounds.

[6] Appellant's remaining points have to do with the determination of the rental value of the premises. It is claimed that the evidence does not sustain the court's finding in this regard. But an examination of the record discloses the familiar situation of a conflict in the evidence, and, since there is testimony supporting the conclusion reached, that conclusion cannot be assailed here.

[7, 8] It is further urged that the court below erred in sustaining objections to two questions asked by appellant of witnesses testifying on the matter of value. In one of these instances—that of the witness Dassel—the substance of the testimony sought to be elicited was brought out by later questions. The other question was put to the appellant himself. He was testifying in his own behalf, and had given his opinion of the rental value of the land. He was then asked what he had "undertaken to do with reference to renting this out." The court properly declined to permit an answer to this question. See Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 34 Pac. 224.

The order is affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David J. Piercy, deceased. From an order settling the account of Edward M. Piercy, as administrator, Andrew J. Piercy, administrator, appeals. Modified and affirmed.

John E. Alexander, of San Francisco, and Beasly & Fry and Fry & Jenkins, all of San Jose, for appellant. Rogers & Bloomingdale, of San Jose, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal by Andrew J. Piercy from the same order which was under review in Estate of Piercy (S. F. No. 6819), 145 Pac. 88, just decided. In the former case the administrator appealed from the order settling his account. Here the opposing party appeals from that part of the order refusing to charge the administrator with compound interest on the rental value of the land of the estate. There is a separate transcript covering the present appeal, but many of the important facts are stated in the opinion filed in S. F. No. 6819, 145 Pac. 88. The record shows further that, with the exception of personal property appraised at $142.50, the entire estate of David J. Piercy consisted of the real estate which was the subject of the litigation between Mary Piercy and Edward M. Piercy. The bill of exceptions sets forth that at the hearing of objections to the account filed by the respondent evidence was introduced showing that, ever since his appointment as administrator, said Edward M. Piercy had been guilty of neglect of the estate; had claimed all the estate as his own; had used and conducted all the business and property thereof as his own; and had used the rents, issues, and profits thereof in his own business and for his own benefit.

[1, 2] We think the appellant is right in his contention that the court should have charged respondent with interest at the legal rate, compounded with annual rests, upon the amount found due from him as the rental value of the real property of the estate. This is the ordinary rule where a trustee has used the trust property for his own benefit. If any loss occurs, the loss must be borne by him, while the beneficiaries are entitled to any profits realized. Walls v. Walker, 37 Cal. 424, 99 Am. Dec. 290. "The true rule in equity in such cases is to take care that all the gain shall go to the cestui que trust." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) §§ 1277, 1278. Where, as here, the settlement of the estate has been long delayed, and the administrator has himself used funds belonging to the estate, the heirs will not be fully compensated unless they receive compound interest upon the property of the estate thus withheld. These views are sustained by an unbroken current of authority. Estate of Stott, 52 Cal. 403; Estate of Clark, 53 Cal. 355; In re Hilliard, 83 Cal. 423, 23 Pac. 293; In re Eschrich, 85 Cal. 98, 24 Pac. 634; Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 345, 639; Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441, 44 Pac. 182; Bemmerly v. Woodward, 124 Cal. 568, 57 Pac. 561; Estate of Hamilton, 139 Cal. 671, 73 Pac. 578; Glassell v. Glassell, 147 Cal. 510, 82 Pac. 42; Estate of McPhee, 156 Cal. 335, 104 Pac. 455, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 899.

That the distribution of the estate was unjustifiably delayed—a circumstance which has been regarded as having an important bearing on the question of liability for compound interest (In re Hilliard, supra)—can hardly be questioned. There was but one heir. The claims were not of large amount. The necessary proceedings for administration could have been speedily concluded. The only reason for the long delay was that the administrator asserted a claim to the lands against the estate. This claim was adjudged to be based upon his own fraud and undue influence. The fact that he set it up and litigated it cannot entitle him to any special consideration. It is equally clear that the administrator violated his trust by using the property of the estate for his own benefit in conjunction with property belonging to him. There may be cases in which the trial court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, grant or deny compound interest. Here, however, the misconduct of the administrator was so clearly shown that there was no room for the play of discretion. It is suggested by appellant that the trial court based its conclusion on the view that it could not allow interest, simple or compound, on the rental value, because such value was unliquidated and, until the making of the order, unascertained. But we think this consideration has no bearing on the question. It has often been held that, in actions for damages for tort or breach of contract, interest as such cannot be allowed where the amount of damage is unliquidated and incapable of being made certain. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; Coburn v. Goodall, 72 Cal. 498, 14 Pac. 190, 1 Am. St. Rep. 75; Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 311, 42 Pac. 811; Swinnerton v. Argonaut L. & D. Co., 112 Cal. 375, 44 Pac. 719; Macomber v. Bigelow, 123 Cal. 532, 56 Pac. 449. But this rule has no application here. It is a rule governing the allowance of interest in actions for damages. Civ. Code, § 3287. Other considerations must govern a court in fixing the liability of a delinquent trustee. In such cases the primary consideration is the equitable one that the trustee must be compelled to fully compensate the beneficiary for the unauthorized use of the trust estate. As we have already indicated, compensation would not be complete if interest were withheld.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Ida M. Sherwin, executrix of the estate of B. E. Sherwin, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Grant Jackson, Wm. L. Jarrott and J. S. Jarrott, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. J. W. McKinley, Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, Henry T. Gage, W. I. Foley, and W. I. Gilbert, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal is from an order granting the defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was begun by the decedent, B. E. Sherwin, in his lifetime, to recover damages caused by bodily injuries received by him through the negligence of the defendant. There was a trial, resulting in a verdict and judgment in his favor. Proceedings for a new trial were immediately instituted by the defendant, but before the hearing of its motion the plaintiff died, and the present plaintiff, his executrix, was substituted as plaintiff. Thereafter, the court below granted the motion and ordered a new trial. There was no appeal from the judgment.

[1, 2] The respondent makes the preliminary objection that the action abated upon the death of the original plaintiff. The objection is based on the theory that the granting of the new trial vacates the judgment, and upon the familiar rule that a right of action for damages for personal injuries to the plaintiff caused by negligence of the defendant does not survive the death of the plaintiff. It is contended that the order granting a new trial sets the matter again at large without a judgment, to as full extent as if there had been no judgment. We think the objection is untenable. It is well settled that the death of the plaintiff in such an action after a judgment in his favor, and while the judgment stands, does not abate the action or affect the validity of the judgment. Such judgment becomes a part of his estate, and may be enforced by his representatives. Accordingly, it has been held that the death of the plaintiff after such judgment and while a motion for a new trial is pending, or during the pendency of an appeal by the defendant from an order denying a new trial, does not abate the action, and that in such a case the judgment stands until it is vacated on the appeal, and that if the order is affirmed, the original judgment is good. Fowden v. Pacific C. S. Co., 149 Cal. 154, 86 Pac. 178. The question of the effect of an order granting a new trial, in such a case, when the death occurs after the judgment and either before or after the granting of the new trial, has not been heretofore presented to this court, so far as we are advised.

But the right of appeal from the order is given and we think the conclusion is inevitable that if, upon such appeal, the order is reversed, the judgment will remain or be restored to its original condition as if the order vacating it had not been made. The order, in such a case, is vacated, and the original judgment stands. An order granting a new trial does not absolutely vacate the judgment; it is absolutely vacated only when such an order becomes a finality. Puckhaber v. Henry, 147 Cal. 425, 81 Pac. 1105. In Pierce v. Birkholm, 110 Cal. 672, 43 Pac. 205, speaking of an order granting a new trial, the court said:

> "While its ultimate effect, if unappealed from, or if sustained upon the appeal where one is taken, is to vacate the judgment and require another trial of the action, such result does not follow until the finality of the order is determined in one or the other modes suggested. In this respect it is not distinguishable from any other order or judgment from which an appeal is given. Pending an appeal therefrom it is * * * set at large, and the rights of the parties stand unaffected thereby, excepting in so far as their prosecution may be stayed by virtue of the provisions of the statute. * * * 'The reversal of an order granting a new trial leaves the verdict and judgment standing.' Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 229." Rev. Ed., § 3, p. 16.

The effect of these principles is that during the time within which an appeal may be taken from such an order, and while the appeal therefrom, if taken, is pending, the order is subject to the condition that if it is reversed, its effect to vacate the judgment will be annulled, and the judgment will then stand as if no order granting a new trial had been made, or as if the motion had been denied and such denial had become final or had been affirmed on appeal. The appellant is therefore entitled to prosecute this appeal, in order to produce this result and restore the judgment to its original vigor if the appeal is successful.

[3] The only matter urged as ground for a new trial occurred during the examination of the jurors upon the voir dire. One C. C. Horton was called and sworn to answer questions. After having been examined and passed by the plaintiff, the following colloquy occurred during his examination by the attorneys for the defendant:

> "Q. Were you ever injured in a railroad accident? A. No, sir. Q. Any member of your family ever injured in a railroad accident? A. No, sir. Q. Never had any suits against the railroad company? A. No, sir."

After some further questions on other subjects, he was accepted by both parties, sworn as a juror, and sat in the trial of the cause. The defendant exercised its four peremptory challenges upon other persons called to serve as jurors. After the verdict the defendant asked for a new trial on the ground that Horton had given untrue answers to the last two of the aforesaid questions. In support thereof affidavits were filed showing that at the time of the trial an action was pending in that court wherein Harold Johnson, a minor, by C. C. Horton, his guardian ad litem, was plaintiff and the Southern Pacific Company was defendant; that it was an action to recover damages for personal injuries to Johnson alleged to have been caused by the negligence of said defendant; that Johnson was the grandson of the wife of Horton; that the attorneys for the defendant who conducted the trial were ignorant of the fact that Horton was acting as the guardian ad litem of Johnson in said action, or of his relation to Johnson, and did not discover the same until after he was accepted as a juror in the cause, and that if they had been aware of said facts they would have challenged Horton for cause, as a juror, and, if necessary, would have excluded him from the jury by a peremptory challenge, and that they exhausted their peremptory challenges on other jurymen.

The affidavits in support of the motion for a new trial merely show that the attorneys conducting the trial for the defendant were not aware of the facts aforesaid at the time the impanelment of the jury was completed. They do not show that they did not discover said facts afterwards during the trial and before the rendition of the verdict. It may be conceded that the conduct of the juror Horton in giving a false answer to the questions put to him constituted misconduct or irregularity on his part sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial therefor. See Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) § 45. But where misconduct or irregularity of this character is relied on as ground for new trial, the affidavits of the moving party must show affirmatively that both he and his counsel were ignorant of the facts constituting the misconduct or irregularity charged until the rendition of the verdict. 12 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 558, and cases there cited; State v. Barrington, 198 Mo. 93, 95 S. W. 235. If the defendant or its attorneys had discovered these facts at any time during the trial, it would have been their duty, if they desired to take advantage thereof, to apply to the court for leave to reopen the examination of the jurors, elicit the facts, and thereupon offer a challenge to the juror guilty of the misconduct.

in failing to show that they did not acquire such knowledge during the course of the trial after the jury was sworn, the defendant failed to present sufficient ground for a new trial for that cause. The order granting a new trial was therefore erroneous.

The order is reversed.

LICENSES (§ 7*)—OCCUPATION TAX ON BANKING BUSINESS.

An occupation tax imposed by a city ordinance on the right to do a banking business was invalid under Const. art. 13, § 14, providing for the taxation of the capital stock of all banks doing business within the state and declaring that such tax shall, with certain exceptions, be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses upon the stock and property of such banks.

Actions by the Southern Trust Company, a corporation, the Security Savings Bank, a corporation, the Germania American Savings Bank, a corporation, and the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation, against the City of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, and others. From judgments for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Haas & Dunnigan, Shankland & Chandler, and Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. John W. Shenk, Albert Lee Stephens, and Myron Westover, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The appeals in the above-entitled cases involve the same question, namely, the validity of the municipal ordinance of the city of Los Angeles imposing an excise or occupation tax upon the right of these banking corporations to conduct their business, which excise or occupation tax is fixed as follows:

> "Sec. 20. For every person, firm or corporation carrying on the business of banking, a monthly license of one and one-half cents for each one thousand dollars of the total amount of loans and discounts of such person, firm or corporation."

The Constitution of this state (article 13, § 14) provides for the taxation of the capital stock of all banks doing business within the state, and declares that the tax in the Constitution prescribed "shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon such shares of stock and upon the property of such banks, except county and municipal taxes on real estate and except as otherwise in this section provided." It should be said that these cases were decided by the trial courts in advance of the decisions of this court in the cases hereinafter named. Respondents upon these appeals seek to draw the distinction that the occupation tax of the city of Los Angeles imposed upon banking institutions is not a tax or license upon their shares of stock or upon their property. This argument, and, indeed, all of respondents' contentions as to the validity of the tax, are disposed of against their position by the cases of City and County of San Francisco v. Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 166 Cal. 244, 135 Pac. 971, Hartford Insurance Company v. Roberts et al., 142 Pac. 839, and Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, 143 Pac. 700. A reference to these decisions relieves from the necessity of any discussion of the matter. For the reasons therein given this tax is invalid and the judgments are reversed and the causes remanded.

HENSHAW, J. By the Constitution of this state (article 13, § 14, subd. A revenue ordinance of Los Angeles in sections 82 and 83 declares as follows:

"Sec. 82. For every person, firm or corporation conducting, managing, or carrying on the business of local fire insurance agent, solicitor or broker, whether the insurer be a corporation, mutual company or individual, $10 per quarter for each such insurer represented by such agent, solicitor or broker.

"Sec. 83. For every person, firm or corporation conducting, managing or carrying on the business of a general or local insurance agent, whether for life, accident, plate glass, bicycle, liability, fidelity, automobile, or other insurance except fire insurance, whether the insurer be a corporation, mutual company, or individual, ten dollars per quarter; provided, that one license issued under the provisions of this section shall entitle the licensee to conduct any or all or any part of the businesses in this section enumerated."

Under the authority of Los Angeles Trust Company v. City of Los Angeles (L. A. No. 3271), 145 Pac. 94, this day decided, no doubt can be entertained but that if this privilege tax were imposed upon the insurance companies themselves it would be invalid. The distinction sought to be drawn in this case is that this particular license fee is not imposed upon the companies but upon the agents of the companies. This is true, but upon the other hand it is equally true that every insurance corporation must act through agents and can act only through agents, and that, therefore, in a direct and immediate sense a tax upon such agents for the right to do business is a tax upon the corporation's right to do business. The agents of corporations are the means whereby the corporations live and in opposition to a tax upon their agents the corporations may well be heard to voice Shylock's expostulation:

"You take my house when you do take the prop
That doth sustain my house; you take my life
When you do take the means whereby I live."

But in exposition of the fact that this principle does not rest upon the authority of Shakespeare alone, a reference may be made to McCall v. People of California, 136 U. S. 109, 10 Sup. Ct. 881, 34 L. Ed. 391; Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 11 Sup. Ct. 851, 35 L. Ed. 649; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 8 Sup. Ct. 1383, 32 L. Ed. 311; Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing District, 120 U. S. 489, 7 Sup. Ct. 592, 30 L. Ed. 694; Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 14 Sup. Ct. 829, 38 L. Ed. 719; Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 444, 6 L. Ed. 678; Tennessee v. Scott, 98 Tenn. 254, 39 S. W. 1, 36 L. R. A. 461; Kansas City v. Oppenheimer, 100 Mo. App. 527, 75 S. W. 174.

It follows, therefore, that the imposition of this occupation tax upon the agents of insurance corporations does violation to article 13, section 14, of the Constitution of this state, and may not be enforced.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 162*)—DEFAULTS—VACATION.
Where one in default makes seasonable application to be relieved and files an affidavit of merits alleging a good defense, and plaintiff files no counter affidavit and makes no showing that he has suffered any prejudice by the delay, or that injustice will result from a trial on the merits, very slight evidence is necessary to warrant vacation of the default.

Where plaintiff made no counter showing, it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to set aside a default judgment against the defendants, who asserted that they had a good defense, and that their ignorance of the English language and of the necessity for verifying their answer prevented them from calling on their attorney and filing a proper answer.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Bernardo Berri against Maria Rogero and another. From an order setting aside and vacating a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for appellant. S. J. Hankins and H. J. Hankins, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SULLIVAN, C. J. Appeal from an order setting aside default and vacating judgment.

Plaintiff, Bernardo Berri, sued Maria Rogero and Pietro Rogero to recover $1,000 for alleged malicious acts of Maria Rogero and malicious prosecution by her of a civil action. The facts alleged in the complaint and out of which the cause of action arose are, in brief, as follows: Berri had commenced an action against Pietro Rogero in the justice court of San Francisco to recover $200 on Pietro's promissory note; a writ of attachment was issued in the case, and a levy was made by the sheriff upon one computing scale and one cash register in the possession of Pietro. In his complaint against the defendants herein the plaintiff alleged that Maria Rogero, maliciously intending and contriving to annoy and injure plaintiff and without probable cause, claimed the property attached as her own, thereby compelling Berri to furnish the sheriff an indemnity bond in the sum of $500 to hold the levy. He further alleged that thereafter Maria Rogero maliciously and without probable cause, in her individual capacity, and as guardian ad litem of four infants, brought an action against himself and the sheriff for the recovery and possession of the property attached, or the value thereof, $200, in case delivery could not be had, and $50 damages. This action, it is alleged, terminated in favor of Berri and his codefendant, the sheriff. By reason of the aforesaid acts, Berri claimed in his complaint that he "was greatly annoyed and was caused great inconvenience and much loss of time and put to considerable money outlay in defending said actions of defendant herein, Maria Rogero," to his damage in the sum of $1,000, for which amount he prayed judgment against both defendants. No cause of action whatever is alleged in the complaint against Pietro. He is not charged with any wrongful act, but, as stated by plaintiff in his complaint, "all of the aforesaid acts were done by the defendant Maria Rogero maliciously, without probable cause," etc. From the affidavits used on motion to set aside the default it appears that Pietro is the husband of Maria, but the plaintiff did not in his complaint allege that fact, nor did he allege any fact from which the relation of husband and wife between defendants could be inferred. The complaint was verified. The summons in the action was duly served on defendants in April, 1911. After time to plead had been repeatedly extended, the defendants, on the 31st day of May, 1911, by their attorney, filed an unverified answer to the complaint, containing a general denial and nothing more. Thereafter the plaintiff moved for an order striking from the files the unverified answer. This motion was met by a counter motion, made through the same attorney, for leave to file a verified amended answer. In support of this motion the attorney filed an affidavit in which he stated that he had written twice to the defendants, requesting them to call at his office to verify their answer; that he had received no reply from them, or either of them, and that defendants failed to call at his office because, as he believed, the letters were lost in the mail, or the defendants, through ignorance of the English language and of the laws of this state, did not realize the necessity for verifying their answer. On the 23d day of June, 1914, the motion to strike out the unverified answer was granted and leave to file a verified amended answer was denied. In the order denying the motion the court ordered a stay of proceedings for 10 days "to allow counsel for defendants to bring defendants into court and show why the order denying leave to file a verified answer should be set aside and vacated." The record does not disclose that counsel for the defendants did within the 10 days specified or at all, bring or attempt to bring his clients into court to show cause as provided in the order, or that he communicated or tried to communicate with them concerning the case. Judgment by default was rendered on July 24, 1911, in favor of plaintiff and against both the defendants for the sum of $500. Thereafter each of the defendants, through substituted attorneys, separately moved the court to set aside the default and judgment taken against them. The motions were heard on the 25th day of August, 1911. In each instance the motion was based upon inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, and in the case of Pietro upon the additional ground that the complaint failed to state any cause of action against him. It appears from the affidavits used on the motion that the defendants are foreigners, Italian-Swiss, and utterly unable to understand, read, or write the English language; that Maria Rogero called once at the office of her original attorney and requested him to defend the action; that the defendants are unacquainted with legal procedure and judicial proceedings, and that they did not know that it was necessary for another call to be made upon the attorney; that they did not know and were not informed that any other act upon the part of either was necessary to present a defense to the action. They each deposed that if their attorney sent any letter to the affiant, the same was not read by either by reason of their ignorance of English; that no letter from him was read to either by any one; and that the contents of any letter from him were not made known to either. The usual affidavit of merits accompanied the moving papers. No counter affidavit was filed by or on behalf of Berri in opposition to the motions. The court set aside the default and judgment and imposed terms upon the defendants by requiring them to pay the plaintiff his costs of action amounting to $27.70. The record comes before this court upon a bill of exceptions. Evidently oral testimony was heard upon the motion, for the order setting aside the default and judgment recites, among other things, that upon a hearing of the motion, "oral and documentary evidence being introduced, and the affidavits of the defendants herein and all the records, files and proceedings in said action being duly read and considered, and after argument by respective counsel, said cause was, on the said 25th day of August, 1911, duly submitted to the court for consideration and decision," etc. No evidence, however, appears in the record other than the affidavits above mentioned found in the bill of exceptions.

[1-4] We cannot say that the lower court, upon the showing made by the defendants in their uncontradicted affidavits, committed error in setting aside the default and judgment. The law does not favor snap judgments. The policy of the law is to have every litigated case tried upon its merits, and it looks with disfavor upon a party who, regardless of the merits of his case, attempts to take advantage of the mistake, surprise, inadvertence, or neglect of his adversary. Where a party in default makes seasonable application to be relieved therefrom, and files an affidavit of merits alleging a good defense, and the plaintiff files no counter affidavit and makes no showing that he has suffered any prejudice, or that injustice will result from the trial of the case upon its merits, very slight evidence will be required to justify a court in setting aside the default. A broad discretion is allowed to courts in granting relief, against default, and it is in cases only where the lower court has abused its discretion that the appellate court will reverse its action. Counsel for appellant and respondents in their briefs agree, and this court agrees with them, that the following is a correct statement of the rule applicable to courts in dealing with defaults:

> "It is largely a matter of discretion, to be liberally exercised by the court in the furtherance of justice, and where the action of the trial court will result in a trial upon the merits, the appellate courts are very reluctant to interfere with the exercise of such discretion, and will do so only where it clearly appears that there has been a plain abuse of discretion."

In O'Brien v. Leach, 139 Cal. 220, 72 Pac. 1004, 96 Am. St. Rep. 105, this court thus lays down the rule upon the subject:

> "In matters of this sort the proper decision of the case rests almost entirely in the discretion of the court below, and this court will rarely interfere, and never unless it clearly appears that there has been a plain abuse of discretion. This court will usually sustain the action of the court below upon the same facts, whether that decision is for or against the motion; but it is much more disposed to affirm an order when the result is to compel a trial upon the merits than it is when the judgment by default is allowed to stand, and it appears that a substantial defense could be made."

In view of the rule thus admitted and declared, if the lower court had before it only the affidavits of the defendants upon the hearing of their motion, this court could not say that it had abused its discretion in setting aside the default and judgment. But it appears from the order itself that, in addition to the affidavits of the defendant, oral evidence was heard upon the motions and that upon this evidence, as well as upon the affidavits, the order was made. That being so, this court must presume, even if it be conceded that the affidavits in themselves were insufficient to sustain the order, that the oral testimony introduced upon the hearing warranted the court in setting aside the default and judgment.

[5] It is a well-settled rule of law that where evidence is omitted from the record this court must presume that the omitted evidence fully justified the order appealed from, although the evidence contained in the record itself is insufficient.

It follows from the foregoing that the order appealed from must be and the same is hereby affirmed.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 235*)—OPTIONS—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION.

A contract to convey to the first party "fifty thousand dollars" in bonds at par of a corporation to be formed by the second parties is not an agreement to deliver bonds, but a promise to pay money, with an option to pay in bonds, and on failure to act under the option the money became due, and recovery could be had, without alleging or proving the value of the bonds.

Frank H. Gould, of San Francisco, Frank Freeman, of Willows, and Frank H. Short, of Fresno (Vincent Surr, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. A. L. Shinn, of Sacramento, J. W. Dorsey and R. M. F. Soto, both of San Francisco, E. Weyand, of Colusa, S. C. Denson, of San Francisco, and A. C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action was begun by the decedent, Byron D. Beckwith, in his lifetime, to enforce certain trusts set forth in the complaint. Upon the first trial the defendants recovered judgment. Upon appeal this judgment was reversed. See 154 Cal. 393, 97 Pac. 867. Upon the second trial the plaintiff recovered judgment, declaring a lien upon the property of the Central Canal & Irrigation Company for $50,000, and also a personal judgment against the said company for that sum. The plaintiff, believing he was entitled to greater relief, appealed from the judgment, but it was affirmed. See 165 Cal. 319, 131 Pac. 1049. The present appeal is by the defendants from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The opinions above referred to contain elaborate statements of the facts involved in the controversy. It will not be necessary here to state them at great length. The sole proposition now urged for reversal is that the decision is against law, because of the failure to find the value of the $50,000 in bonds that were to be issued to Beckwith; the theory being that this issue is material and that the judgment for $50,000 cannot be supported, in the absence of a finding that said bonds were worth that sum.

After the reversal of the first judgment, the plaintiff filed a fourth amended complaint. The second judgment was given after a trial upon this complaint. The judgment for the plaintiff was based on a compromise agreement executed on April 8, 1903, between Beckwith, as first party, and Sheldon and Schuyler, as second parties. Sheldon and Schuyler held certain water rights which had been conveyed to them by Beckwith in trust to be conveyed to a corporation which was to carry on the irrigation enterprise contemplated in the agreement. This agreement first provided that a former agreement should be canceled and annulled. It then proceeded to declare that in consideration of said cancellation, and of certain conveyances by Beckwith to Sheldon, or to a corporation, Sheldon and Schuyler would organize a corporation to be named "Sacramento Canal Company," with a capital stock of $1,000,000, which company should provide for and authorize a bond issue of $1,000,000, secured by a trust deed of all its property. To this corporation, when organized, all the property held by all the parties for the purposes of the scheme was to be conveyed. The agreement then closed with the following clause:

> "And the parties of the second part further promise and agree that they will cause such proceedings to be had as that there shall be paid to party of the first part, in consideration of the rights which he has theretofore conveyed to parties of the second part, and which he will convey to said corporation, the sum of $50,000 in said bonds of the Sacramento Canal Company, at par, which shall be in full extinguishment and payment of all rights and demands of the party of the first part upon the said corporation, or upon the parties of the second part, or upon the property or rights so to be conveyed to the said corporation."

Prior to the execution of this agreement Sheldon and Schuyler had formed the defendant corporation, the Central Canal & Irrigation Company. The parties, including said company, thereupon agreed that it should be substituted for the Sacramento Canal Company, proposed in said agreement as the corporation to carry out the purposes of the agreement of April 8th, and that it should assume the obligations and perform the duties therein imposed on the proposed Sacramento Canal Company, and should take and hold the property agreed to be conveyed to said Sacramento Canal Company. Thereupon the property referred to was conveyed to said defendant, Central Canal & Irrigation Company, and said corporation accepted the same, and in consideration thereof undertook to perform the obligations and carry out the purposes of said agreement, including the issuance of bonds to Beckwith. Thereafter said company, in pursuance of the agreement, provided for a bond issue of $1,000,000 secured by a trust deed of its property, and set apart $50,000 thereof, at face value, duly signed, for delivery to Beckwith in discharge of the obligation of the agreement as above set forth; but it refused to deliver them, neither said bonds nor any other bonds were ever delivered or issued to him, and said obligation remains unperformed and unsatisfied.

The defendants' argument is that the portion of the agreement above quoted was, in effect, an agreement by Schuyler and Sheldon to deliver the bonds of the defendant corporation to Beckwith, and that upon the failure to deliver the bonds of the defendant corporation to Beckwith the measure of damages would be the value of the bonds at the time delivery was due, or afterwards, at plaintiff's option. Civ. Code, §§ 3309, 3336. If this were the true aspect of the case, it would be conceded that a finding of the value of the property to be sold would be essential to a recovery of damages, and such value should be alleged and proved. There is neither allegation nor finding of the value. Mr. Freeman, in his note to Roberts v. Beatty, 2 Pen. & W. (Pa.) 63, in 21 Am. Dec. 425, says that there is some diversity of opinion as to how agreements to pay a sum of money in specific articles at a fixed rate shall be construed, in case of failure to furnish the articles within the time specified; that "one line of authorities holds that such contracts are agreements for the delivery of specific property," in which case the remedy of the promisee is by action for damages, and the value of the articles is material. To this view he cites seven cases. Of these only five are to the point, namely, Mattox v. Craig, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 584, Cole v. Ross, 9 B. Mon. (48 Ky.) 393, 50 Am. Dec. 517, McDonald v. Hodge, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 85, Meason v. Philips, Add. (Pa.) 346, and Edgar v. Boies, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 445, to which we add Starr v. Light, 22 Wis. 433, 99 Am. Dec. 55. Of the other two cases cited, Justrobe v. Price, Harper (S. C.) 111, was an agreement to "deliver" rice, not to pay money, and Wilson v. George, 10 N. H. 445, merely decides that, under the technical rules of the common law as to forms of action, a recovery on such contract cannot be had in an action for money had and received. Other New Hampshire cases hold that such recovery may be had in a declaration specially upon the contract. Odiorne v. Odiorne, 5 N. H. 315; Tibbets v. Gerrish, 25 N. H. 41, 57 Am. Dec. 307. In Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and South Carolina, later cases state the doctrine that such contracts become payable in money if the payor fails to deliver the articles. Roberts v. Beatty, supra; Choice v. Moseley, 1 Bailey (S. C.) 136, 19 Am. Dec. 661; Bloomfield v. Hancock, 1 Yerg. (9 Tenn.) 101. Mr. Freeman proceeds to say that the greater weight of authority is in favor of the doctrine that, upon the failure of the payor to deliver the articles within the time provided, the contract becomes an obligation to pay the sum of money mentioned, and may be sued on as such. He cites to this effect cases from the states of Virginia, Connecticut, Indiana, Illinois, New York, Vermont, Texas, Kansas, and Massachusetts. Mississippi, Maine, Ohio, Alabama, North Carolina, Oregon, Louisiana, and Nebraska also follow this doctrine. The citations to the cases may be found in Mr. Freeman's note aforesaid, and in volume 11 of the Century Digest, tit. Contracts, §§ 1105, 1106. In California also this doctrine has been adopted. Marshall v. Ferguson, 23 Cal. 69; Cummings v. Dudley, 60 Cal. 385, 44 Am. Rep. 58.

[1, 2] Looking to the terms of the agreement, it is easily seen that it is not a mere agreement for the delivery of the bonds. The promise is "that there shall be paid to" Beckwith "the sum of $50,000." This is not an agreement to sell or deliver bonds, but a promise to pay money. The addition of the words "in bonds of the * * * company, at par" does not change it into an agreement solely for the delivery of the bonds, but merely gives the payor the option or privilege of making such payment by delivering the bonds as specified when the time of performance arrived. The defendant Central Canal & Irrigation Company, having received the consideration furnished to the enterprise by Beckwith, and having undertaken to perform the obligation to him set forth in the agreement, was bound thereby to the same extent as if it had been a party thereto. When it thereupon refused to perform the obligation, the promise became an absolute money obligation, and the value of the bonds was immaterial, or at all events the payment in money became immediately due (Brown v. Foster, 51 Pa. 173), and the payee could sue thereon as upon a money obligation, and recover without alleging or proving the value of the bonds. Much more is its character as a money obligation apparent when the nature of the thing to be substituted for money in payment is considered. The company was to deliver its own bonds for $50,000, its promises to pay that sum, in satisfaction of the amount which Beckwith was to receive in the settlement. Its debt would remain the same; the only advantage to it would be that the time of payment would be postponed. For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the omission of a finding of the value of the bonds is immaterial.

[3] With regard to that part of the judgment which declares a lien on the property of the company, we need only say that, under the well-established principle of equity that that which ought to have been done will be deemed to have been done, it is held that where a party agrees to give a mortgage or lien on property, or imperfectly attempts to execute such mortgage or lien, upon a valuable consideration received, a court of equity, upon a proper showing, will create a specific lien on the property intended to be hypothecated, and enforce the same. Daggett v. Rankin, 31 Cal. 327; Racouillat v. Sansevain, 32 Cal. 389; Love v. Sierra, etc., Co., 32 Cal. 653, 91 Am. Dec. 602; Remington v. Higgins, 54 Cal. 623; Peers v. McLaughlin, 88 Cal. 297, 26 Pac. 119, 22 Am. St. Rep. 306; Higgins v. Manson, 126 Cal. 470, 58 Pac. 907, 77 Am. St. Rep. 192; Hall v. Cayot, 141 Cal. 18, 74 Pac. 299; Kreling v. Kreling, 118 Cal. 419, 50 Pac. 546.

We are therefore of the opinion that the motion for a new trial was properly overruled.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1914.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 315*)—DISTRIBUTION — INTEREST — CONCLUSIVENESS OF DECREE.

Any claim of right to interest on a legacy prior to the decree of distribution of the estate should be asserted in the proceeding for distribution, so that the decree distributing to one only the amount of her legacy is conclusive against collateral attack, Code Civ. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Gottlieb Schmierer, deceased. From an order in favor of Christina Lee Stourgeon, J. H. Richards and another, executors, appeal. Reversed.

G. Gunzendorfer, of San Francisco, for appellants. Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The will of Gottlieb Schmierer bequeathed $300 to Christina Lee Stourgeon. It gave certain other legacies, and contained a devise and bequest of the residue. The testator died on June 4, 1908, and his will was admitted to probate on July 22, 1908, J. H. Richards and George Schmierer being appointed executors. On March 21, 1913, the executors filed their final account and petition for distribution. On April 7, 1913, the court made its decree settling the final account and distributing the estate. By the decree all of the property remaining in the hands of the executors was ordered distributed pursuant to the terms of the will. Various pecuniary legacies were ordered distributed to the respective legatees, and the residue was ordered distributed to the residuary legatees and devisees. To Christina Lee Stourgeon was distributed $300, the amount of her legacy. In her case, as in that of other legatees, there was no mention of interest on the legacy. In August, 1913, Christina Lee Stourgeon filed a petition alleging that her legacy had not been paid, and praying that the executors be cited to appear and show cause why they should not pay the sum of $300, together with interest thereon, from the 4th day of June, 1909, this date being one year after the testator's death. The citation was issued and the executors appeared. Pending further proceedings, the executors paid to petitioner the sum of $300, the principal of the legacy bequeathed, and there was submitted to the court the question of her right to receive from the executors interest on such legacy from the expiration of one year after the death of the testator. This submission took place on January 27, 1914. The court thereafter made its order determining that the petitioner was entitled to interest on the legacy from the 4th day of June, 1909, ordering the executors to pay to her such interest amounting to $96, and directing that she have execution against the executors for said sum. From this order the executors appeal.

It will be observed that the interest claimed, or the greater part thereof, had accrued prior to the making of the decree of distribution. This decree had become final before the making of the order appealed from. If the legatee was entitled to interest on the legacy (Civ. Code, §§ 1368, 1369), her claim could and should have been asserted in the proceeding for distribution.

"The 'distribution' of an estate includes the determination of the persons who by law are entitled thereto, and also the 'proportions or parts' to which each of these persons is entitled." William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 Pac. 323; Code Civ. Proc. § 1666.

If such decree is erroneous, the remedy is by appeal. Daly v. Pennie, 86 Cal. 552, 25 Pac. 67, 21 Am. St. Rep. 61. No appeal was taken from the decree of distribution in this case, and such decree was therefore a final and conclusive adjudication of the rights which might be claimed by any person as legatee or devisee under the will. Code Civ. Proc. § 1666. By distributing to the respondent the sum of $300 without interest the court determined that she was not entitled to interest. This adjudication is not subject to collateral attack. No direct attack is here made and the petitioner is foreclosed.

Whether the legatee would be entitled to interest during the brief period intervening between the making of the decree of distribution and the payment of the principal of the legacy is a question that is not here raised. At any rate she is not entitled to interest for the time elapsing prior to the making of the decree.

The order is reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Matilda Walden, deceased. From a decree in favor of Martha Munro, in proceedings by her to establish heirship, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants Rachel P. Maher and another appeal. Affirmed.

Leland S. Bowen, of Los Angeles, for appellants. C. M. Stephens, George P. Adams, and Wm. T. Kendrick, all of Los Angeles, Claude R. Ball and James F. Ball, both of Montgomery City, Mo., and Trusten P. Dyer, J. W. Mowell, Elon G. Galusha, Benjamin E. Page, Williams, Goudge & Chandler, F. C. Austin, and C. C. Davis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal from a decree establishing heirship, entered in a proceeding under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The proceeding was instituted by Martha Munro, claiming to be one of the heirs of the decedent. Upon her motion, the court made an order directing service of notice on certain nonresidents by publication, and publication was made. Various persons, including Rachel Maher and Paralie Costa, appeared and filed answers asserting claims as heirs. The default of others was entered, and the matter was heard by the court. The court found that the plaintiff, Martha Munro, and the defendants Wilhelmina Wilson Johnston, Martha Moodie, Sarah Jane Molloy, Robert Ross, and Andrew Ross are the only heirs and next of kin of Matilda Walden, the decedent. It found, further, that neither of the defendants Rachel P. Maher or Paralie Costa was or is in any way related or akin to Matilda Walden, or an heir of said decedent, or entitled to any part of her estate. The particular degree of kinship of the plaintiff and the successful defendants was found, and a decree declaring their rights accordingly was entered. See Estate of Walden, 166 Cal. 446, 137 Pac. 35. From this decree and from an order denying their motion for a new trial the defendants Rachel P. Maher and Paralie Costa appeal. The record on both appeals is embodied in a bill of exceptions.

[1-3] The jurisdiction of the court below is assailed by the appellants, who question the regularity of every step in the proceedings leading up to the publication of notice. But since the appellants themselves appeared in the action, and filed a pleading in which they asked judgment that they were entitled to have the estate distributed to them, they are in no position to make these objections, even if it be assumed that the points urged are meritorious in themselves. Voluntary appearance is equivalent to personal service. Code Civ. Proc., § 416. "Where the defendant appears and asks some relief which can only be granted on the hypothesis that the court has jurisdiction, it is a submission to the jurisdiction of the court as completely as if he had been regularly served with process." 2 Enc. Pl. & Pr., 625; Loan, etc., Co. v. Boston, etc., Co., 126 Cal. 418, 58 Pac. 941, 59 Pac. 296; Zobel v. Zobel, 151 Cal. 101, 90 Pac. 191. Whether other possible claimants were properly brought before the court is no concern of these appellants. They presented their claim to the court for adjudication as fully as the plaintiff did hers (Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522), and, having invoked the jurisdiction, they are bound by its exercise, whether the result be favorable or adverse.

[4] The appellants also attack the various findings which declare the kinship and heritable rights of the plaintiff and the successful defendants, and assert that the court erred in admitting evidence bearing on these findings. There is, however, no specification of insufficiency of evidence to support the finding that these appellants themselves are not related to the decedent and have no interest in her estate. This finding stands, therefore, as an insuperable bar to their right to question the propriety of the determination that others are entitled. Having no interest themselves, they are not aggrieved by a judgment which will result in the estate being awarded to the respondents. Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522; Estate of Blythe, 110 Cal. 231, 42 Pac. 643; Williams v. Sav. & L. Soc., 133 Cal. 360, 65 Pac. 822; Estate of Piper, 147 Cal. 607, 82 Pac. 246; Estate of Walker, 148 Cal. 162, 82 Pac. 770; Estate of Fleming, 162 Cal. 524, 123 Pac. 284.

These considerations dispose of every contention of the appellants.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

In Bank. Petition for prohibition by C. Edgar Elliott against the Superior Court of the State of California for the County of San Bernardino and S. F. Kelley. Writ granted on condition that an issue of fact, to be determined later, is found against respondents.

Tyrrell, Abrahams & Brown, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. William B. Ogden, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SULLIVAN, C. J. The petitioner has applied to this court for a writ of prohibition to arrest proceedings in a certain action pending in the superior court of San Bernardino county, wherein a receiver was appointed. The action, an ordinary one at law, entitled "Brookings Lumber & Timber Co., a Corporation, Plaintiff, v. Gibraltar Investment & Home Building Co., a Corporation, Defendants," was brought to recover $876.56, alleged to be due from the defendant to plaintiff for goods sold and delivered. Hereinafter the plaintiff in the action will be referred to as the Brookings Company and the defendant as the Gibraltar Company.

At the time it filed its complaint the plaintiff moved the court for an order appointing a receiver of the assets of the defendant for the benefit of itself and all other persons similarly situated. The grounds of the motion were "that the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law, and that the fund out of which the plaintiff and other creditors must look for the payment of their claims is in danger of waste, loss, and destruction." On the same day that the complaint was filed the defendant also applied for the appointment of a receiver. Thereupon the court appointed respondent S. F. Kelley receiver of all of the property, real and personal, belonging to the Gibraltar Company, and directed its officers to deliver to the receiver all of its assets of every kind, including real and personal property, moneys, drafts, bills of exchange, checks, or other evidences of indebtedness, and all books of account, deeds, bonds, mortgages, etc. Pursuant to the order appointing him, the receiver duly qualified and took into his custody all of the assets belonging to the defendant. The Gibraltar Company is a California corporation engaged in the business of buying and selling land, operating nurseries, and propagating and selling nursery stock, plants, and trees. Its business, carried on in several counties in the southern part of the state, is very extensive. Its gross assets exceed in value $1,000,000. It is financially involved, is unable to meet its obligations, secured or unsecured, and is, in fact, insolvent. The petitioner claims to be the owner and holder of two notes of the corporation for the sum of $30,000 each, payable on January 1, 1914, executed in favor of the Midas Fruitland Company, and assigned and indorsed by that company to the petitioner. The petitioner alleges that there is due to him on these notes the sum of $57,956.30 principal and an additional amount in excess of $8,000, representing interest, expenses, and attorneys' fees; that these notes are secured by a deed of trust held by the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, covering certain land in San Bernardino county, and including water certificates representing water rights appurtenant to the land. These properties are in the possession of the receiver. It is also alleged in the petition that the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, trustee, acting under the advice of its counsel, has refused to sell or offer for sale, under the power of sale contained in the deed of trust, the property held as security, so long as the same remains in the custody and possession of the receiver; "that upon this property are prior and superior mortgage liens held by divers other creditors of the defendant, aggregating $60,000; that the defendant has defaulted in the payment of interest upon the indebtedness secured by these mortgages; and that one of the mortgagees has already commenced foreclosure proceedings. The existence of these prior mortgages and the default of the mortgagor in the payment of interest thereon, it is alleged by the petitioner, has placed his rights and interests in jeopardy. He alleges that he is in danger of losing all of his rights and interest in said property and will be put to great expense unless the property described in the deed of trust is sold under the power of sale contained therein. It is further alleged that the receiver has incurred, and is now incurring, and will continue to incur, great expense in holding, caring for, and maintaining the properties of the Gibraltar Company, and that he is now exercising, and will continue to exercise, control thereof. After the appointment of the receiver, the petitioner herein filed in the superior court of San Bernardino county, in the action brought by the Brookings Company against the Gibraltar Company, an application styled by himself "Petition in Intervention," in which he prayed that the court "grant and give to him and to the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, the trustee named in said deed of trust, permission to exercise the power of sale granted in said deed of trust and to satisfy the indebtedness secured thereby," etc. This petition was filed by leave of court and was set for hearing at a later date. What action has been taken by the court on this petition does not appear. To the petition for the writ of prohibition the respondents have filed a demurrer specifying several grounds, all of which may be considered as embraced in the general statement "that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a ground for the issuance of a writ of prohibition." The demurrer must be overruled for the reasons herein stated.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] Assuming that the allegations of the petition are true, and for the purposes of the demurrer they must be taken as true, the superior court of San Bernardino county had no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of the assets of the Gibraltar Company. The order appointing the receiver is void, and all of his acts performed in pursuance of his illegal appointment are necessarily void.

[2] Section 305 of the Civil Code, found in title 1, pt. 4, of that Code, and which title contains provisions applicable to all corporations formed under the laws of this state, provides:

> "The corporate powers, business, and property of all corporations formed under this title must be exercised, conducted and controlled by a board of not less than three directors."

The court, through the appointment of a receiver, exercises the powers, conducts the business, and controls the property of the corporation, which, by virtue of this section, can only be exercised, conducted, and controlled by a board of directors. There is no law of this state, nor can any decision of our Supreme Court be found, which authorizes a court, through a receiver, to take charge of the business and property of a corporation before dissolution, dispose of its assets, and wind up its affairs. On the contrary, this court has repeatedly and consistently held for more than 50 years last past that the courts have no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of the entire assets of a corporation in a suit prosecuted by a private party. Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 151, 76 Am. Dec. 508; French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495; Smith v. Superior Court, 97 Cal. 348, 32 Pac. 322; Smith v. Los Angeles & P. R. Co., 4 Cal. Unrep. 237, 34 Pac. 242; Murray v. Superior Court, 129 Cal. 628, 62 Pac. 191; Fischer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 129, 42 Pac. 561. As stated by this court in the French Bank Case, supra:

> "There is no jurisdiction vested in courts of equity to appoint a receiver of the property of a corporation in a suit prosecuted by a private party. This is only to say that there is no jurisdiction vested in these courts in such a case to dissolve a corporation, for the power of a receiver, when put in motion, of necessity supersedes the corporate power. It necessarily displaces the corporate management and substitutes its own. * * * There is no statute of this state, none to which we have been pointed, which undertakes to confer upon a private person, either as stockholder or creditor, the right to maintain an action to dissolve a corporation upon the ground that it is insolvent, or to obtain relief by seizing its property out of the hands of its constituted management and placing it in the hands of a receiver."

If, as stated in this, a court of equity has no power to appoint a receiver of the assets of a corporation, certainly a court, in a common-law action for goods sold and delivered, has no such power.

[3] The fact that the Gibraltar Company consented to the appointment of a receiver is immaterial. Such consent did not and could not confer jurisdiction upon the court to make the appointment. A corporation cannot in this indirect manner destroy itself. It cannot put beyond its reach the power to do that for which it was created. It is the creature of the law, and its powers must be exercised in the manner prescribed by law and not otherwise. If it wishes to die, it may do so, but only in the way ordained by law. It must first satisfy and discharge all claims and demands against it. Two-thirds of its members or stockholders must resolve upon dissolution, and the provisions of title 6, pt. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the voluntary dissolution of corporations, must be complied with. If it must be put to death against its will, then the state, and not a private party, must institute proceedings with that object in view. In Smith v. Superior Court, supra, this court was asked to review an order of the superior court of Los Angeles county appointing a receiver in an action brought by the California Bank against the Los Angeles & Pacific Railroad Company to recover judgment upon an unsecured promissory note. As in the case now under consideration, the plaintiff in that case applied for and the defendant consented to the appointment of a receiver, and the court made the appointment. Yet this court held that the order appointing the receiver was void and in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court. In passing upon the application for a writ of certiorari, referring to the order appointing the receiver, this court (Department 2), speaking through Justice De Haven, said:

> "We are unable to distinguish the action in which the order under review was made from that of the French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495. It was there held that the appointment of a receiver in such an action was unauthorized and void, and should be annulled on certiorari. The only relief to which the plaintiff in the case of California Bank v. Los Angeles & Pacific Railway Co., was entitled to was a judgment against the defendant railroad company for the amount alleged to be due upon the promissory notes of which the plaintiff therein was alleged to be the owner, and in such an action, upon the facts before it, the court was without power to appoint a receiver. The allegations of the complaint, to the effect that the corporation was insolvent, and that other creditors were threatening to sue the defendant railroad, and that said defendant had no property out of which the plaintiff would be able to satisfy any judgment it might obtain, and that the action was brought in behalf of the plaintiff and all other creditors of the defendant railroad who were willing to come in as plaintiffs, did not change the essential character of the action from one at law to recover upon an unsecured indebtedness to one in which, according to the usages of courts of equity, a receiver may be appointed; nor would the consent of the defendant railroad to the appointment of the receiver at all affect the right of any creditor aggrieved thereby to have the order appointing such receiver annulled in a proceeding of this character."

In Smith v. Los Angeles P. R. Co., supra, referring to the same order appointing a receiver made in California Bank v. Los Angeles & P. R. Co., this court said:

> "The order being void, it may be disregarded. If the order is absolutely void, it is a nullity, and can be attacked in any proceeding. That it is absolutely void was clearly demonstrated when the matter was before the court in department in Smith v. Superior Court, supra."

[4] In support of their contention that the superior court had jurisdiction to appoint the receiver, the respondents cite a number of cases wherein the federal courts have decided that in an ordinary action at law an insolvent corporation may confer jurisdiction upon the court to appoint a receiver by merely consenting to the appointment. These authorities are not binding upon the courts of this state. Our state Supreme Court is not even bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, except in cases where the judgment of this court may be reviewed by writ of error to the United States Supreme Court. Such review is permissible only in cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. The case of Brookings Co. v. Gibraltar Co. presents no question which can possibly come within the exception. Under the circumstances, this court is bound to decide according to its own judgment and follow its own decisions, regardless of the decisions of the federal courts.

[5] It is claimed by respondents that inasmuch as the petitioner herein filed a "petition in intervention" in the superior court in the action commenced by the Brookings Company against the Gibraltar Company, wherein he prayed for an order authorizing the sale by the trustee of the property described in the deed of trust given to secure the notes alleged to be held by him, that he thereby became a party to the action, and that his only remedy was by appeal from the order appointing the receiver, and which right he has lost by the lapse of time. There is nothing in this contention. The petitioner here did not intervene in the action in the court below in the sense in which the word "intervention" is used in our Code. His petition, though styled a petition in intervention, is improperly so called. By filing the same he did not become a party to the action. A person may intervene in an action who has an interest in the matter in litigation, or in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both. An intervention takes place when a third person is permitted to become a party to an action or proceeding between other persons, either by joining the plaintiff in claiming what is sought by the complaint, or by uniting with the defendant in resisting the claims of the plaintiff, or by demanding anything adversely to both plaintiff and defendant. Section 387, Code Civ. Proc. The petitioner did not have any interest in the matter in litigation, to wit, plaintiff's claim for goods sold, or in the success of either of the parties, or an interest in the matter against both. He did not dispute the plaintiff's claim, which may or may not be due. He did not ask to join with the plaintiff in claiming what the plaintiff sought in his complaint, nor did he ask the right to unite with the defendant in resisting the defendant's claim, nor did he demand anything adversely to both plaintiff and defendant as to the subject of the action. He therefore did not intervene or become a party to the action.

Isaacs v. Jones, 121 Cal. 257, 53 Pac. 793, 1101.

[6] The interest mentioned in the Code which entitles a person to intervene in a suit between other persons must be in the matter in litigation and of such a direct and immediate character that the intervener will either gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment.

[7] As the petitioner did not become a party to the action by intervention or otherwise, he had no right to appeal from the order appointing a receiver. Having no such right, respondents' contention that petitioner's application must be denied because he had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law by appeal to the Supreme Court is unfounded. Even if the petitioner had by intervention become a party to the proceeding in the superior court, and had a right to appeal from the order appointing the receiver, yet his remedy by appeal would not, under the circumstances of this particular case, have been plain, speedy, and adequate, and a writ of prohibition would lie. Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep 192; White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 245, 58 Pac. 450; Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 21–29, 81 Pac. 225; Dungan v. Superior Court, 149 Cal. 98–103, 84 Pac. 767, 117 Am. St. Rep. 119.

It follows from the foregoing that the demurrer to the petition for a writ of prohibition must be, and the same is, overruled.

This opinion is not to be construed as an authority opposed to the appointment of a receiver of specific property of a corporation, where such appointment would be proper under section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure in certain actions between private parties. Our views must be taken as applying to an action of the kind now before the court and not as applicable to all kinds of cases against corporations.

At the time the respondents filed their demurrer, they also filed an answer to the petition. The answer fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, except in one particular. The petitioner alleges that he is the owner and holder of two certain promissory notes of the Gibraltar Company for $30,000, payable by the terms thereof to the Midas Fruitland Company, and by the latter indorsed and assigned to the petitioner. The respondents in their answer, for want of information or belief upon the subject, deny this allegation. An issue of fact is thus raised. To determine this issue, the court will take testimony on the 14th instant in San Francisco. If the issue be determined adversely to respondents, then a peremptory writ of prohibition will issue as prayed for. But, if the issue be determined against the petitioner, then his petition will be denied for his failure to show any beneficial interest in the subject-matter of the litigation.

Supplemental Opinion.

PER CURIAM. In the above-entitled proceeding the court, in its opinion heretofore filed, overruled respondents' demurrer to the petition herein and decided that the answer of the respondents to said petition, filed with their demurrer, with one exception did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. That exception arose out of the allegation, contained in the petition and denied in the answer, that the petitioner was the owner and holder of two certain promissory notes of the Gibraltar Investment & Home Building Company for $30,000 each, described in the petition. The trial of the issue as to the ownership of these notes was set for the 14th inst. Before the day set the petitioner and respondents filed a stipulation effective for the purposes of this proceeding only in which they agreed that the petitioner is the owner and holder of the notes in question.

Now, therefore, in accordance with our opinion heretofore filed herein, it is by the court ordered and adjudged as follows:

1. That the order of the superior court of the county of San Bernardino made in that certain action pending in that court entitled "The Brookings Timber & Lumber Company, a Corporation, Plaintiff, v. The Gibraltar Investment & Home Building Company, a Corporation, Defendant," appointing S. F. Kelley receiver of the assets of said Gibraltar Investment & Home Building Company, is null and void, and was made by said superior court without and in excess of its jurisdiction.

2. That all acts performed by said court or by the judge thereof in relation to said receiver, his appointment or duties, and all acts of said S. F. Kelley performed under or by virtue of said order of appointment as such receiver, are and each of them is void.

3. That a peremptory writ of prohibition issue out of this court, directed to the Superior court of San Bernardino county and the judge thereof and said S. F. Kelley, arresting all proceedings in said action entitled "The Brookings Timber & Lumber Company, a Corporation, Plaintiff, v. The Gibraltar Investment & Home Building Company, a Corporation, Defendant," in so far as they relate to said receiver, his powers and duties, and absolutely restraining said superior court and the judge thereof, and said S. F. Kelley, from doing any act or thing or performing any function whatever by reason or by virtue of or under said order appointing said receiver.

PEOPLE v. DRENNAN. (Cr. 265.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 31, 1914.)

1. Rape (§ 52*)—Assault with Intent to Rape—Sufficiency of Evidence.

On a trial for assault with intent to rape a girl eight years old, her testimony that she protested against accused's conduct supported a jury finding that his acts were against her consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71–74, 76; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

2. Rape (§ 60*)—Assault with Intent to Rape—Elements.

A conviction for assault with intent to rape was supported by jury findings that accused attempted to have sexual intercourse with a girl eight years old, and that his acts were against her consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Robert Drennan was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was charged by information filed in the superior court of Sacramento county with the crime of rape upon a female under the age of 18 years, and upon a trial for said offense was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape. He appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

The record before us consists entirely of the clerk's transcript, embracing the minutes of the court, the instructions, verdict, etc., and a transcript of the testimony. No briefs on behalf of either the appellant or the respondent have been filed nor was the cause orally argued.

We have, however, taken the pains to examine the testimony, the instructions, and the rulings of the court upon questions involving the admissibility and nonadmissibility of certain testimony, to the allowance of which objections were made and exceptions reserved, and our conclusion is that the defendant was in all respects given a fair and legal trial, and that the verdict appears to be justified.

[1, 2] The record discloses that, although the prosecutrix was but a little over eight years of age, she protested against the conduct of the defendant, which formed the basis of the charge in the information. From this testimony the jury were justified in finding that the defendant's acts were against the consent of the prosecutrix, and such finding, together with the finding that the defendant actually attempted to have sexual intercourse with the child, if, indeed, he did not succeed in doing so, is a sufficient predicate of the conclusion reached by the jury that the crime committed by the accused was that of an assault with intent to commit rape. People v. Akin, 143 Pac. 795.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

ADAMS v. GERIG. (Civ. 1255.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 30, 1914.)

In an action on an account stated, evidence held to support a finding that the account was fairly stated, and there was no fraud or false representations by plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Elvin Adams against C. Gerig on an account stated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Rankin, of Susanville, for appellant. Pardee & Pardee, of Susanville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. An examination of the record shows justification for the following statement of facts made by respondent:

"Plaintiff and his wife were hired by the defendant to work upon the latter's farm in Lassen county, the plaintiff to do general farmwork, and his wife to do housework. They commenced work under this employment April 8, 1909, and continued, with some intervals of lost time, until September 21, 1911. The agreed wages for Mrs. Adams were $15 per month, or 50 cents per day, at all times except during haying and harvesting, when she was to have $30 per month, or $1 per day. There is some conflict as to plaintiff's ordinary wages; he says the agreement was $40 per month while defendant asserts the wages were to be $35 per month. But there is no dispute that his pay was to be $2 per day during haying and $2.50 per day during harvest. In October, 1911, after the termination of the employment, the parties attempted to settle at the defendant's farm; but they could not agree as to the state of their accounts, and at the suggestion of the defendant they went, on October 23, 1911, to Bieber's store at McArthur, in Shasta county, to have R. E. Dunlap, the manager of that store, help them to settle. So they submitted their various memoranda to Mr. Dunlap, and he prepared for them a statement of the account, showing a balance due the plaintiff of $1,192.73. Dunlap was entirely disinterested, and did not influence, or attempt to influence, either party. Defendant signed the statement of account, certifying that he owed the plaintiff the balance therein stated, his signature being by mark and witnessed by Dunlap."

There was a clerical error of $25 in the account, and some items were inadvertently omitted from the settlement. These items are mentioned in the findings and were taken into account in arriving at the amount of judgment given to plaintiff. "After the statement of the account, and before the plaintiff sued, the sum of $426.40 was paid on account by the defendant. The plaintiff commenced his action August 9, 1912, basing it on the account stated."

Defendant by his answer denied that the account was stated, and alleged that plaintiff and Dunlap presented the account to defendant and requested him to sign it and, upon his objection, urged and persuaded him to sign it, and falsely and fraudulently represented to him that it was true and correct. It is further alleged that the account is not correct; "that mistakes were made in the computation of wages of plaintiff and his wife; that it does not contain all the cash or merchandise received by plaintiff from defendant; and that many items of account were omitted therefrom." The cause was tried upon the issues as thus presented, the fullest opportunity being afforded to show the inaccuracy of said account or that fraud or improper influence was practiced, and the court gave judgment to plaintiff for $723.12, and found that "the account was stated as alleged by plaintiff; that it was fairly stated, and no fraud was perpetrated, and no false representations were made by plaintiff or any one acting for him; but that all mistakes were mutual."

[1] The appeal is from the judgment. The finding of the court as to the absence of fraud and the fairness of the transaction culminating in the said statement of account is abundantly supported. Indeed, as claimed by respondent, the testimony of the defendant himself would be sufficient for that purpose, and the account of the settlement and of the surrounding circumstances given by Mr. Dunlap, an entirely disinterested witness, could lead the court to no different conclusion.

[2] The only other question of moment is whether it was proper for the court, upon an action for account stated, to allow evidence of omissions and errors therein and to find in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the developed facts. As to this, under the decisions, there can be no kind of doubt.

The rule is, as stated in Branger v. Chevalier, 9 Cal. 353, as follows:

"Accounts stated may be opened, and the whole account taken de novo, for gross mistake, in some cases. * * * But this can only be done when the gross error affects all the items of the transaction." When "the clear mistake only affects a portion of the items of the stated account, it will be permitted to stand, except in so far as it can be impugned by the party alleging the error. And when the party who seeks to go behind the stated account goes into particulars, and specifies the items improperly charged or omitted, he is confined to those items, and the remainder of the account must stand."

In Carpenter v. Kent, 101 N. Y. 591, 5 N. E. 787, the same question was considered, and the court said:

> "We do not think that the defendants had the right to have the whole account opened, but that they were bound by the account actually settled, unless they could show some mistake or fraud in the settlement. Where an account has thus been adjusted by the parties, if any mistake is subsequently discovered, the whole account need not be opened and readjusted, but the mistake can be corrected and the rights of the parties readjusted as to such mistake."

It is useless to multiply quotations, but, as sustaining the same doctrine, we may mention the following additional authorities: Tuggle v. Minor, 76 Cal. 100, 18 Pac. 131; Conville v. Shook, 144 N. Y. 688, 39 N. E. 405; Story's Equity (13th Ed.) §§ 523 to 525; 1 R. C. L. p. 220.

Under the issues as made by the complaint and answer, the court very properly allowed, therefore, said account to be surcharged and falsified, and directed judgment in favor of plaintiff for $723.12, instead of $766.40, as claimed.

The findings of fact are supported, they are within the issues, and they in turn support the judgment, and we have discovered no reason for interfering with the conclusion of the lower court.

The judgment is affirmed.

Lennig-Rapple Engineering Company for the doing of public work in the city and county of San Francisco. The bond was given pursuant to a statute enacted in 1897 requiring that the person seeking relief under the bond shall file with the board of public works a verified statement of his claim within 30 days from the time such work is completed, and providing, further, that suit may be filed by such claimant within 90 days after the filing of such claim. The work here was completed prior to February 26, 1912, but the claim was not filed until April 12, 1912, and the suit was begun July 18, 1912. But, while the statute in force at the time of the execution of the contract required the filing of the claim and the commencement of the action as stated above, in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1422) the said act was amended and said respective periods were extended, and it is conceded by said appellant "that if the act of 1911 is operative in this case, the claim was properly filed and the suit commenced within proper time." It is insisted, however, that "the amendatory act of 1911 should not be construed as being retroactive and the provisions of the act in force when the bond was executed should be considered the sole criterion."

Respondent, though, calls attention to several decisions directly in point that support the view taken by the trial court. Appellant has not seen fit to notice any of these cases, although it is stated that they were relied upon in the trial court. We content ourselves with specific reference to only three of those cited.

In Bear Lake v. Garland, 164 U. S. 1, 17 Sup. Ct. 7, 41 L. Ed. 327, the question involved an amendment providing an extension of time for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien and Mr. Justice Peckham, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> "The mere enlargement of the time in which to commence the action, at least in a case where the time had not yet arrived in which to file any statement of the plaintiff's claim for a lien, does not affect any right or remedy provided for in the old act. The right, as that term is used in the statute, consisted of the right of sale of the property in order, if necessary, to obtain payment of the money due the contractor. The remedy consisted of the taking of certain proceedings by which this sale was to be accomplished. Prior to the arrival of the time when one of these steps was to be taken an alteration of the statute by which the time to take that step might be enlarged was not an alteration of the right or of the remedy, as those terms are used in the statute, nor did it in any way affect either; it was simply an alteration of the mere procedure in the course of an employment of a remedy, the remedy itself remaining untouched or unaffected by such alteration. In this case such an enlargement of time to commence an action was given before the time had arrived in which the action could have been commenced under the old statute."

It was therefore held that the new act applied to plaintiff's case. In this instance it may likewise be said that the enlargement of the time for filing the claim and beginning the action was made before the time had arrived in which either of said steps could be taken under the old statute, and in principle the two cases are not distinguishable.

A later case is National Surety Co. v. Architectural Decorating Co., 226 U. S. 276, 33 Sup. Ct. 17, 57 L. Ed. 221. Therein the action was brought on a bond, under a Minnesota statute, providing that the parties executing the bond shall be liable, with the condition that the claimant serve notice within 90 days after he finishes his work. After the bond had been executed and delivered, the statute was amended so that time for service of the notice was extended. The claimant served a notice which was late according to the time limit provided in the original statute but was within the time limit as extended by the amendment. The United States Supreme Court held that the extension of time operated merely as a modification of the remedy and did not impair the obligation of the contract, the court saying:

> "The decision must turn, we think, upon the familiar distinction between a law which enlarges, abridges, or modifies the obligation of a contract and a law which merely modifies the remedy, by changing the time or the method in which the remedy shall be pursued, without substantial interference with the obligation of the contract itself. * * * In the case now before us, we agree with the Minnesota Supreme Court in the view that the requirement of a preliminary notice to the obligors as a condition precedent of an action upon the bond affects the remedy and not the substantive agreement of the parties, and although the statute as it stood when the bond was given * * * must * * * be treated as if written into the contract, it still imposed a condition not upon the obligation, but only upon the remedy for breach of the obligation. Therefore the subsequent statute * * * effected merely a change in the remedy, without substantial modification of the obligation of the contract."

The case of Kerckhoff-Cuzner Mill Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 80, 24 Pac. 648, involved the construction of a statute shortening the time within which a mechanic's lien could be filed. The court said:

> "We do not think that the amendment, when applied to the case in hand, is retroactive in effect. It is true, it shortened the time which the respondent would otherwise have had to file its claim and thus seek its remedy. But the authorities are numerous to the effect that a change of remedy, or in the time within which it must be sought, does not impair the obligation of a contract, provided an adequate and available remedy be left."

We think the foregoing cases properly state the rule and are decisive of the controversy here.

There is no more merit in the contention of appellant that the bond does not conform to the requirement of the statute. It seems to follow closely the language of the statute, and specifies that the bond is given as required by an act of the Legislature, entitled "An act to secure the payment of the claims of materialmen, mechanics or laborers employed by contractors upon state, municipal or other public work, approved March 27, 1897." St. 1897, p. 201.

The foregoing are the only points made by appellant and, as they seem untenable, the judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; John L. Childs, Judge.

Otto Creitser was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. M. Frost, of Eureka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant pleaded guilty, in the superior court of Del Norte county, to an information charging him with the crime of rape upon a female under the age of consent, May Bartol by name—a name by no means unfamiliar to this court, its possessor having been the victim of similar mistreatment to that charged against the defendant by four other parties, who were convicted of the offense, and who unavailingly appealed their cases to this court. See People v. Bartol, 142 Pac. 510; People v. Hoosier, 142 Pac. 514; People v. Horn, 144 Pac. 641; People v. Taggart, 144 Pac. 1197, the opinion in which was filed in this court on October 27, 1914.

The present appeal is from the judgment and the order denying the defendant a new trial, "and from each and every order of said superior court made after pronouncing judgment in the above-entitled cause."

[1] There has been no record of the testimony filed in this court, nor are there any briefs on file herein. There was no appearance in behalf of the defendant when the cause was regularly called on the calendar at the last regular term of the court, and the Attorney General, therefore, submitted the case on the record, such as it is, now before us. Under these circumstances, we would be justified in ordering the appeals herein dismissed. Rule 5, Supreme Court (160 Cal. xlvi, 119 Pac. x); People v. Perry, 16 Cal. App. 772, 117 Pac. 1036. But the record is brief, and therefore, while not deemed necessary, we have gone to the trouble of examining it carefully, and have discovered nothing therein which would warrant us in sustaining any of the appeals, if, indeed, it may be said that any has been properly taken.

[2] It appears that the defendant's case was called for trial on November 12, 1913, and the same was then proceeded with. Before completing the jury panel the defendant withdrew his plea of not guilty theretofore interposed, and entered a plea of guilty to the charge alleged in the information. The court thereupon fixed Saturday, November 15, 1913, as the time for pronouncing the judgment of sentence. Thereafter the court continued the matter of sentencing the defendant from time to time until the period elapsing between the day upon which he pleaded guilty and the day upon which sentence was finally pronounced comprehended over 100 days.

It appears from the affidavit of counsel for the defendant that, after entering a plea of guilty, and after the several postponements by the court of the time for passing sentence, as above explained, the defendant withdrew his plea of guilty and asked that his case be set down for trial. The matter of fixing a date for the trial of the case was continued until February 24, 1914, at which time the defendant again entered a plea of guilty to the information, and declared to the court that he desired to dispense with any further services of his attorney. The defendant, upon entering his plea of guilty at said time, waived time for the passing of sentence, and the court thereupon and immediately pronounced its judgment.

Thus we have presented all the important facts disclosed by the record of this case as filed in this court.

Although, as stated, no brief was filed or oral argument presented on behalf of the defendant, we may assume that the point upon which the defendant claims the right to a reversal is that (so he might claim), the sentence having been pronounced long after the time within which the law provides that such act shall be performed (section 1191, Pen. Code), the court lost the right or the legal authority to pronounce sentence or judgment at all. That section provides that after a plea or verdict of guilty the court must appoint a time for pronouncing judgment—

"which must not be less than two nor more than five days after the verdict or plea of guilty; provided, however, that the court may extend the time not more than ten days for the purpose of hearing or determining any motion for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment; and provided further, that the court may extend the time not more than twenty days in any case where the question of probation is considered, in accordance with section twelve hundred and three of this Code. If in the opinion of the court there is a reasonable ground for believing a defendant insane, the court may extend the time of pronouncing sentence until the question of insanity has been heard and determined, as provided in chapter six, title ten, part two of this Code."

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Referring to said section, the Supreme Court, in Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 189, 191, 106 Pac. 718, 719, says:

"The effect of this section is that the court has no authority to fix the time for pronouncing judgment for a day later than 5 days after the verdict; that, if a motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment is made, the court may, for the purpose of deciding the same, extend the time for 10 days, and that, where the question of probation is considered, the court may, for that purpose, extend the time 20 days. These two provisions for extension of time are not cumulative, and the latest date to which the court is authorized to extend the time for rendering judgment, where present insanity is not involved, is a day not more than 25 days after the date of the return of the verdict." See, also, People v. Flavin, 21 Cal. App. 244, 246, 131 Pac. 321.

But, assuming that there is a legal appeal here, it is readily obvious that, while the court in the first instance exceeded its authority by postponing the matter of passing sentence beyond the time expressly limited by the statute, that point cannot now be urged by the defendant, since it appears, as we have shown, that he withdrew his plea of guilty after the matter of pronouncing judgment had been postponed from one date to another until the statutory period had been passed, and that, after so withdrawing said plea, he again entered a plea of guilty, waived time for the pronouncing of judgment, and the court thereupon and at once pronounced its judgment of sentence. The court, therefore, in passing sentence was obviously within the time limit prescribed by the statute for pronouncing judgment upon what seems to have been at that time the only plea to the information before it.

The judgment and all the orders appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

John C. Simons was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and appeals. Conviction affirmed.

A. L. Frick and Gehring & Wyman, all of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. In this case an appeal is taken from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The points made in support of the appeal are that certain evidence introduced by the prosecution for the purpose of showing the motive of the defendant for the commission of the crime was too remote; that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in his argument to the jury; and that too wide a latitude was allowed in the cross-examination of the defendant.

[1] Remoteness may affect the weight of evidence, but it does not ordinarily affect its admissibility.

[2] We are satisfied that the evidence complained of was admissible under the general rule that motive may be shown where there is any doubt about the identity of the perpetrator of the offense; or that motive may be shown generally, although not necessary to be shown in every case. In the present case, if there was a likelihood that the complaining witness was in any way an obstacle to the sexual gratification of the defendant, that might be a motive for assaulting the complaining witness with the intent to murder him. If that be so, the testimony assigned as erroneously admitted was proper for the purpose of showing motive, and also for the purpose of clearing up any doubt there might have been as to the identification of the person guilty of the assault.

We do not think there was any misconduct on the part of the district attorney sufficient to warrant particular mention. As to the cross-examination of the defendant, we are satisfied it was legitimate and within the rule.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WADE et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY BANK. (Civ. 1414.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 34*)—EXPRESS TRUST—OWNER'S CHECK TO DISCHARGE MECHANICS' LIEN.
Plaintiffs performed labor and furnished material for a building, for which they were not paid. They filed a lien, and served on the owner notices to withhold payments to the building company. Thereafter the owner delivered to defendant bank, where she had a deposit, a check, with direction to pay the building company on its production of satisfactory release of the plaintiff's lien and notices, which was certified by defendant bank and remained in its possession for three years, during which time the building company notified the bank that it had no interest in the check. No demands were made on the bank, which thereafter applied the check upon the drawer's indebtedness. Held, that there was no trust as between the plaintiffs and the bank, and the transaction did not constitute a trust in plaintiff's favor.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by William Wade and others against the City and County Bank. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jesse H. Steinhart, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. W. Sawyer and Arthur H. Barendt, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This action was brought by plaintiffs to obtain judgment against defendant for funds claimed to be held in trust by defendant for the benefit of plaintiffs. Plaintiffs had judgment, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

The facts upon which the alleged trust arose are as follows:

[1] In March, 1907, Carolina Taubles entered into a contract for the construction of a building with the Yerba Buena Building Company. At that time she was a depositor with the defendant bank. Plaintiffs each performed labor upon and furnished material for the construction of the building, for which they were never paid. The plaintiffs filed liens upon the building, and also served on the owner notices to withhold payments to the building company. For the purpose of settling with the contractor, the owner delivered, in March, 1907, to defendant bank a certain check, drawn upon it, with instructions to pay it to the building company on the production of satisfactory releases of the liens and notices to withhold, executed by plaintiffs. The check was subsequently certified by the defendant bank, and remained in its possession for nearly three years, during which time no demand whatsoever was made upon the bank by any one for the funds represented by it. In February, 1910, the construction company served notice upon the defendant bank that it no longer held any interest in the check. In March, 1910, a creditor of the owner, Carolina Taubles, endeavored to levy execution on her account with the defendant bank; and thereupon the bank applied the amount of the money represented by the check upon an indebtedness of said Carolina Taubles to it under its bankers' lien. Subsequently, and on December 8, 1911, plaintiffs herein filed a suit against the bank, claiming that it held the amount of their liens in trust for them. In their argument in support of the judgment, it is claimed by respondents that the transaction between Carolina Taubles and the defendant bank created a trust in their favor. This contention cannot be maintained. There is no evidence to show that the transaction was made for the benefit of plaintiffs. The check was made payable to the Yerba Buena Building Company. Defendant was directed to pay to said company the amount of the deposit upon the production of certain releases of liens and withhold notices. The arrangement in no manner directed the payment to plaintiffs of the amount of their claims, nor was there any duty assumed by the defendant under the arrangement toward plaintiffs or any recognition of their rights. Merely accepting the check under the given directions in itself created no obligation on the part of the bank toward plaintiffs. There was no contractual obligation between them. Whatever rights plaintiffs had were based upon the mechanics' lien law. This right was initiated by plaintiffs by the filing of their liens. For some reason which the record does not disclose, they failed to pursue this right; but nowhere does the evidence show that their action in this respect was due to the fact that the owner had made the arrangement with the defendant bank for the payment of their claims. The money was not received by defendant for the benefit of plaintiffs, but was received, if for the benefit of anybody, for the benefit only of the building company.

The instructions to the bank were to pay the money to the Yerba Buena Building Company only when it produced satisfactory releases mentioned. The building company never presented any releases or demand for the money; but on the contrary, about three years afterward, they disclaimed any interest in the fund.

Upon no theory is there any privity between the plaintiffs and the defendant; and no ground exists upon which plaintiffs can claim any right in the fund involved.

There is no evidence to show that plaintiffs relied in any manner upon the deposit thus made or were in any way prejudiced by it. So far as the evidence shows, they did not rely upon the transaction for the payment of their claims; and in fact there is no testimony indicating in the slightest degree that they ever knew anything about it; nor is there any evidence to show that plaintiffs did a single thing that demanded recognition or that defendant recognized their rights or did anything upon which a liability might be created.

[2, 3] The transaction did not constitute a trust or, as is claimed, an equitable assignment; nor is there anything that could in any manner be construed as creating an estoppel in favor of the plaintiffs, for, so far as the record shows, they knew nothing of it. The entire transaction was simply a means adopted by the owner of the building of setting aside money with which to pay her contractor, in which the plaintiffs were in no manner privies to or in any manner affected by it. Bluthenthal & Bickart v. Silverman, 113 Ga. 102, 38 S. E. 344.

There being no evidence to support the findings that the deposit was made for the benefit of plaintiffs and that they held such fund in trust for them, it follows that the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by A. J. Hartfield against Frank Alderete. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Motion denied.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Lester E. Hardy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff, who is respondent, moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that notice thereof and request for a transcript was not filed within 10 days after notice to the defendant of the entry of judgment. The appeal was taken under the alternative method. No notice of the entry of judgment was served upon defendant. After the entry of judgment defendant, as shown by the certificate of the clerk, prior to taking any steps to appeal therefrom, filed a bond the purpose of which was to stay execution of the judgment; and respondent contends that actual notice of the entry of judgment must be deemed implied from the filing of such stay bond.

[1] The judgment was entered on July 2, 1914, and the notice of appeal was filed July 27, 1914. Section 941b, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that such notice of appeal "may be filed at any time after the rendition of the judgment, order or decree, but the same must be filed within sixty days after notice of entry of said judgment, order or decree has been served upon the attorneys of record appearing in said cause or proceeding, provided, however, that if no notice of entry of judgment be given the notice must, nevertheless, be filed, under any circumstances, not later than six months after the entry of the judgment, order or decree." Since no notice of the entry of judgment was served upon the attorneys of record for the defendant, the 60 days within which the appeal must be taken, where such service is had, did not begin to run, and, the appeal having been taken prior to the giving of such notice and within 6 months after the entry of judgment, it follows that the appeal was taken within the time prescribed therefor.

[2] It is the service of the notice which starts the 60 days to running, and not the fact that defendant may have had actual notice of the entry of judgment. In discussing a like question in the case of Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. California Development Co., 143 Pac. 725, it is said:

> "But the 60 days for taking an appeal under section 941b runs from and after 'notice of entry * * * has been served upon the attorneys of record. * * *' This implies, as is intimated in Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 109 [110 Pac. 109], 'that the notice * * * contemplated is necessarily a notice in writing which may be served in the ordinary manner of serving a writing.' Parol evidence that a party knows a fact, or his written statement from which such knowledge may be inferred, is not equivalent to service upon him of written notice of the fact."

See, also, Foss v. Johnstone, 158 Cal. 119, 110 Pac. 294, and Huntington Park Improvement Co. v. Park Land Co., 165 Cal. 429, 132 Pac. 760.

[3] Section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, having reference to the preparation of a transcript of the evidence in lieu of a bill of exceptions, provides that the party adopting such method in bringing up the record shall file "with the clerk of the court from whose judgment, order or decree said appeal is taken, or to be taken, a notice stating that he desires or intends to appeal, or has appealed therefrom, and requesting that a transcript of the testimony offered or taken * * * be made up and prepared." "Said notice must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment, order or decree." One of the grounds urged by respondent for dismissal of the appeal is that this notice and request for transcript was not filed within 10 days after notice to defendant of the entry of judgment; and, although the appeal was taken in time, it is insisted that the act of the clerk in preparing the transcript was unauthorized, by reason of the fact that the request therefor was not made within 10 days after defendant had actual notice of such entry. The notice of entry of the judgment contemplated by this section, while not so stated, must nevertheless, under section 1010 of the Code of Civil Procedure, be a written notice. As stated, no written notice of entry of the judgment was at any time served.

[4] While a party entitled to written notice may waive the same, evidence of such waiver must appear from the record. Gardner v. Stare, 135 Cal. 118, 67 Pac. 5; Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 356, 61 Pac. 1123. There is nothing in either the clerk's or the reporter's transcript disclosing any fact tending to show that appellant had any notice of the entry of judgment. The fact that prior to taking the appeal defendant filed a stay bond is evidenced by matter dehors the record. The bond was a mere loose sheet of paper, performed no function whatever, and hence the act of filing it was a nullity. It cannot, in our opinion, be considered as evidence of a waiver of the written notice of the entry of judgment to which defendant was entitled.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by George S. Montgomery against Walter E. Dorn and others. From judgment for plaintiff and denial of new trial, defendant A. J. Rankin appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for appellant. R. H. Cross, of San Francisco, A. F. St. Sure, of Alameda, and L. W. Lovey, of San Francisco, for respondent Montgomery.

CHIPMAN, P. J. In plaintiff's amended complaint it is alleged that defendant Fitch executed his promissory note to plaintiff September 26, 1908, for the sum of $1,360, payable 90 days after date, with interest after maturity, secured by certain shares of Home Circle Cash Store & Mail Order House, a corporation; that, after the execution of said promissory note, and prior to the commencement of the action, defendants Dorn and Rankin "expressly and in writing undertook, agreed, and promised the said Chas. A. Fitch, for a good and valuable consideration moving to them, and to each of them, to pay the said promissory note and the whole thereof for the express benefit of plaintiff herein, and said undertaking, agreement, and promise has at no time been rescinded." The prayer is for judgment against defendants for $1,360, with interest at 7 per cent. after December 26, 1908, and that said pledged property be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of said indebtedness, and for general relief.

Defendant Rankin interposed a general and special demurrer to the amended complaint, which, being overruled, he answered by expressly denying its averments. Defendant Dorn answered, and, on information, denied most of the averments of plaintiff's amended complaint, and, by way of answer thereto, set forth what he alleged to be the facts in the transaction, to wit: That, on or about September 7, 1909, as agent and attorney of Rankin, and not otherwise, he entered into a written agreement (plaintiff's Exhibit 3) to purchase for Rankin from defendant Fitch and one H. McDonald certain shares of said corporation, referred to in plaintiff's complaint, and, in consideration of the transfer of said stock by Fitch and McDonald to Rankin, the said Rankin promised and agreed to pay for said shares certain cash to Fitch, and to liquidate certain designated claims, and among them the said claim of plaintiff; that, in pursuance of said contract, said shares were transferred to Rankin, and Rankin paid to Fitch the amount agreed—to wit, $150—and one other claim, but did not pay certain other claims, nor did he pay the said claim of plaintiff; that he (Dorn) acted solely as agent and attorney of Rankin, and so informed defendant Fitch and said McDonald, and "that said defendant A. J. Rankin was the principal in said contract, and that the defendant, Walter E. Dorn, was but the agent and attorney for said party"; that, in pursuance of said contract, said Rankin became the sole owner of said stock of said corporation.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The court gave judgment for plaintiff against defendants Fitch and Rankin for the sum of $1,360, and interest at 7 per cent. from December 29, 1908, and directed that the said shares be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of said amount, and that the action be dismissed as to defendant Dorn. Defendant Rankin alone appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Upon sufficient evidence the court found that the averments of the amended complaint were true, and that the averments of defendant Rankin's answer were not true. Specifically, and on sufficient evidence, it found that Fitch executed the promissory note as alleged, and pledged the said shares as alleged and as testified to by defendant Fitch, and that no part of said promissory note has been paid; that the transaction by which defendant Rankin became liable for the payment of said promissory note was substantially as alleged in defendant Dorn's answer and as testified to by him; that Dorn was acting solely as Rankin's agent and attorney and by his direction and with his knowledge and consent, and that, pursuant to said written agreement entered into by Dorn, Rankin paid certain of the claims therein agreed by him to be paid, but that he did not pay plaintiff's said claim; that Dorn received no profits or benefits from said transaction, and that "defendant A. J. Rankin received all the benefits and profits accruing from said contract, and was and is the principal thereunder; that defendant A. J. Rankin received valuable and sufficient considerations for the execution of said contract of October 7, 1909, as hereinafter set forth." Finding numbered 7 is as follows:

> "That defendant A. J. Rankin, after the said execution and delivery of said promissory note, * * * to wit, on or about October 7, 1909, expressly and in writing undertook, agreed, and promised the said Charles A. Fitch, for a good and valuable consideration moving to him, to pay the said promissory note owing from said C. A. Fitch to plaintiff and the whole thereof for the express benefit of plaintiff herein, and said undertaking, agreement, and promise has at no time been rescinded."

[1] 1. Appellant's first proposition is that there is a fatal variance between paragraph 4 of the complaint and the findings thereon; namely, finding 7, supra. This paragraph stated that Walter E. Dorn and A. J. Rankin "expressly and in writing undertook, agreed and promised the said Charles A. Fitch, for a good and valuable consideration moving to them, and to each of them, to pay said promissory note and the whole thereof, for the express benefit of the plaintiff." The claim is that "both Dorn and Rankin undertook in writing to pay said promissory note and that both received consideration therefor, while the findings, based upon the evidence as it was viewed by the court, are that A. J. Rankin alone 'expressly and in writing undertook, agreed, and promised' to pay said promissory note"—citing People v. Cummings, 117 Cal. 497, 49 Pac. 576. In that case the indictment charged that the note was obtained by false pretenses, describing the notes as having been executed by one person as maker, but the proofs showed that the note was executed by two persons as joint makers, and the variance was held material. No such case appears here. It was not alleged that Dorn and Rankin jointly executed the agreement and it was not found that Rankin "alone" entered into the agreement, but rather that he, through his agent, Dorn, entered into it.

[2] Dorn was, on the face of the agreement, a principal, while, in fact, he was the agent of the undisclosed principal. "The general rule is that, where the contract is made by an agent within the scope of his employment, both the agent and the undisclosed principal, when discovered, are liable on the contract, and may be joined as defendants thereon." 31 Cyc. p. 1624. It was not necessary to aver the fact of agency, "it being sufficient to charge the act as that of the principal, without disclosing the fact of the agency" (Id. p. 1626); and where "the proof is that such acts were done or knowledge obtained by his authorized agent, there is no variance" (Id. p. 1638). Rankin was shown by the evidence to have been the undisclosed principal, and was properly joined with Dorn as party defendant, and as to Rankin a good cause of action was stated. Rankin was therefore not prejudiced, whether or not a judgment went against Dorn. Allen v. Globe Grain & Milling Co. et al., 156 Cal. 286, 291, 104 Pac. 305.

[3, 4] 2. In making his proofs plaintiff introduced testimony as to the execution and delivery of the note; also as to the pledging of the shares of the corporation; also as to the contract for the sale of certain of these shares—to all of which defendant Rankin objected, on the ground that his name did not appear on the note or in the contract, and that each transaction was res inter alios acta. The testimony was relevant when offered as to the other defendants, and the testimony later along in the trial fully connected Rankin with the transactions. We discover no error in admitting this or any of the evidence offered. It was competent to show who received the benefits of the transaction, and it was competent to show by Dorn for whom he was acting. "While the statements or admissions of one not as a witness that in a certain transaction he acted as agent for another are not competent to prove the fact of agency, yet, if he is called as a witness, his testimony, not only that he acted as the agent of the party, but as to the fact of agency, * * * where it rests in parol, is as competent as that of any other witness." McRae v. Argonaut Land & Development Co., 6 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 145, 54 Pac. 743; Mechem on Agency, § 101.

[5] 3. Some further points are presented on motion for nonsuit which will be briefly noticed. It is claimed that the evidence showed that the contract was the obligation of A. J. Rankin & Co., and not that of Rankin. Dorn testified that, to the best of his knowledge, Rankin was a member of the said company, and that he represented the company in the negotiations. The evidence was that Rankin was the only person disclosed as principal. Dorn testified that Rankin received the benefits and profits of the contract, and that he was acting for Rankin throughout the transaction, and that Rankin became the owner of the stock "in pursuance of the contract." Rankin was a witness in his own behalf. Neither in his answer nor in his testimony did he claim that his firm was a party to the transaction. The testimony of defendant Fitch, as well as that of Dorn, shows that the transaction was for Rankin's individual benefit.

[6] Appellant further contends that the contract was invalid, because it was an agreement to pay the debt of another, and was not signed by Rankin, and that Dorn had no authority in writing to act for Rankin, citing sections 1624 and 2309, Civ. Code. "The promise of a transferee of property, made in consideration of the transfer, to assume and discharge an indebtedness of the transferror to a third person, is obligatory on him although resting in parol." 20 Cyc. 174; Sacramento Lumber Co. v. Wagner, 67 Cal. 293, 7 Pac. 705; Tevis v. Savage, 130 Cal. 411, 62 Pac. 611; Doe v. Allen, 1 Cal. App. 560, 82 Pac. 568. Inasmuch as the agreement was one not required to be in writing, it was not essential that Dorn's authority to act for Rankin should be in writing, and section 2309 of the Civil Code has no application.

It is also claimed that Dorn's authority was "expressed in general terms" and hence he had no authority "to act in his own name," citing section 2322 of the Civil Code. Dorn was asked by appellant's attorney to state why he had not presented the contract to Rankin to be signed. He answered:

> "For the reason that Mr. Rankin did not want to buy the stock in his own name, as he said to me, and he said he didn't want to buy it in his own name for the reason that, he being in the grocery business, the creditors of the Home Circle Cash Store were so numerous, and it was Mr. Rankin's opinion if they knew he was the purchaser they would insist on being paid in full, and it was his idea that, by purchasing it in my name, I would be able to make a settlement with the creditors for a less amount than 100 per cent. on the dollar."

He testified directly that Rankin requested him (Dorn) to execute the contract in his own name.

[7] 4. The production of the promissory note showing no indorsement of payment was prima facie evidence of nonpayment. Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127; Hurley v. Ryan, 137 Cal. 461, 70 Pac. 292; Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142.

[8] 5. Finally, it is contended that the contract, plaintiff's Exhibit 3, is not the contract contemplated by section 1559 of the Civil Code, which provides as follows:

> "A contract, made expressly for the benefit of a third person, may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it."

Dorn was the party of the second part in the contract and by its terms it was agreed:

> "That the party of the second part shall assume and pay or liquidate the following claims against the parties of the first part (C. A. Fitch and A. H. McDonald) or either of them, to wit: The claim of A. J. Rankin Company, and his assignee, F. B. O'Reilley, for the sum of $2,600.00 or thereabouts. The claim of Morris Bros. Company for the sum of $350.00 or thereabouts. The claim of George S. Montgomery, for the sum of $1,360.00, or thereabouts, together with interest. Pay to C. A. Fitch between $100.00 and $150.00 immediately upon a transfer of all of the stock."

There was evidence, and the court found, that Rankin, in accordance with said contract, paid Fitch the sum of $150, and Morris Bros. Company $350, but did not pay plaintiff as by said contract he agreed to do. The contention of appellant is that plaintiff, Montgomery, was to receive under this contract "nothing more than a mere incidental benefit" and that, applying the recognized definition of the word "expressly," the conclusion "is inescapable that the same [the contract] was never intended for the 'express benefit' of plaintiff, Montgomery, in this action, and is therefore not within the provisions of section 1559 of the Civil Code." Cases are cited, of which Chung Kee v. Davidson, 73 Cal. 522, 15 Pac. 100, is an example, where the court said:

"The general rule applicable to cases of this kind is 'that, when two persons, for a consideration sufficient as between themselves, covenant to do some act which, if done, would incidentally result in the benefit of a mere stranger, that stranger has not a right to enforce the covenant, although one of the contracting parties might enforce it as against the other."

Is this such a case? In our opinion, the contract cannot be so construed. The contract reads:

"That the parties of the first part [Fitch and McDonald] sell, and the party of second part [Dorn] buys [describing the shares of stock] upon the following terms and conditions, to wit: That the party of the second part shall assume and pay," etc., as quoted above.

In addition to the promise to pay the claims mentioned, Dorn (Rankin) was to give Fitch a position in case Dorn (Rankin) succeeded in reorganizing the corporation whose stock he was buying, and Fitch was to receive some of the shares of this new corporation if organized. There is nothing in the contract, however, that gives the slightest ground for the contention that plaintiff's interest in it was merely incidental. The payment of the claims mentioned was the chief consideration for the transfer of the stock, and when we substitute Rankin for Dorn, as the evidence fully warrants our doing, it seems to us very clear that the contract was made "expressly for the benefit" of plaintiff. Dorn testified that in making the sale of the stock Fitch insisted that certain claims against him should be paid, among them the claim of Montgomery evidenced by the note in suit. Hence the provision in the contract for the payment of this claim. Dorn delivered the contract to Rankin, who must be presumed to have known what his obligations were under it. He discharged part of them pursuant to the contract, and we can see no reason for holding that he should not discharge the one here involved. Many cases might be cited to show that section 1559 is not confined in its application to the case of a sole or primary beneficiary. Washer v. Independent Mining Dev. Co., 142 Cal. 702, 76 Pac. 654, Bacon v. Davis, 9 Cal. App. 83, 98 Pac. 71, and Goff v. Ladd, 161 Cal. 257, 118 Pac. 792, are among such cases. The principle here involved is further illustrated in cases such as Malone v. Crescent City M. & T. Co., 77 Cal. 38, 18 Pac. 858. There defendant agreed to pay a certain amount to a creditor of one Murray, who was engaged in running logs for defendant. It was held that an original indebtedness was thus created in favor of the creditor of Murray, and that, if a contract be for the benefit of a third person, even though he be not cognizant of it when made, the promise, if adopted by him, is deemed to have been made to him, and he may sue thereon, though the whole consideration moved to the promisor from the original promisee; and it is no objection to such action that the original promisee might also sue upon the promise. This principle was applied where the grantee of a mortgagor assumed the payment of the mortgage debt. Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 438, 37 Pac. 411; Alvord v. Spring Valley Gold Co., 106 Cal. 547, 40 Pac. 27. See, also, Meyer v. Parsons, 129 Cal. 653, 62 Pac. 216; Tevis v. Savage, 130 Cal. 411, 62 Pac. 611.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. AMADIO. (Cr. 540.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 11, 1914.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 553*)—Evidence — Sufficiency.

Contradictions and inconsistencies in the testimony of prosecutrix do not make her testimony inherently improbable.

2. Criminal Law (§ 1159*)—Evidence—Sufficiency.

That conflict appears in the testimony of the prosecution or on the whole case is not ground for a reversal of a conviction.

3. Witnesses (§ 380*) — Impeachment — Inconsistent Statements.

The district attorney may, in attempting to impeach accused as a witness, call his attention to his testimony on a prior trial, though what was said and done by the district attorney on the former trial was to trap accused into an inadvertent answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1210–1219; Dec. Dig. § 380.*]

4. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Trial—Misconduct of District Attorney.

Personal references by the district attorney to counsel for accused made in the heat of trial are not prejudicial to accused.

5. Criminal Law (§ 1137*)—Election of Offense—Effect.

Where the district attorney, at the suggestion of counsel for accused, elected to rest his case on a particular transaction, and accused, through his counsel, acquiesced in the election, accused could not complain because the district attorney selected a date different from that alleged in the information.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; L. S. Church, Judge.

Antonio Amadio was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Eric G. Scudder, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. We are satisfied that none of the points made in support of the appeal is sufficient to warrant a reversal.

[1] The contention that the testimony is inherently improbable is based entirely upon claimed contradictions and inconsistencies in the testimony of the prosecutrix. Contradictions and inconsistencies in the testimony of a witness alone will not constitute inherent improbability.

[2] The best that can be said in favor of the argument in support of the appeal is that there is a pronounced conflict in the testimony offered upon behalf of the prosecution, but it is only a conflict; and, whether it appear in the evidence offered on behalf of the people or in the evidence adduced upon the whole case, it will not constitute a ground in this court for a reversal of the judgment.

[3] We see no prejudice to the defendant in the conduct of the district attorney that will justify this court in reversing the judgment. Whatever was said and done by the district attorney in the first trial of the case may or may not have been by way of trapping the defendant into an inadvertent answer; but, however that may be, the district attorney was within his rights when, in an attempt at impeachment, he called the attention of the defendant upon the second trial of the case to his testimony given upon the prior trial.

[4] The district attorney's references to counsel were purely personal, and evidently made in the heat of battle, and we fail to see how they operated to prejudice the defendant.

[5] With reference to the contention that the proof adduced at the trial is at variance with the allegations of the information with respect to the date of the commission of the alleged offense, we are satisfied that the district attorney had the right to elect, and did elect, upon the suggestion of the counsel for the defendant, to rest upon a particular transaction as the foundation of his case, and that the defendant, through his counsel, acquiesced in that election. No particular harm, therefore, came to the defendant by reason of selecting a date different from that alleged in the information.

[6] Moreover, we believe it to be the general rule that, if the act is shown to have been committed prior to the filing of the information and within the period of the statute of limitations, no complaint can be made here upon the ground of a variance. Even if a variance had occurred, it was incumbent upon the defendant, in view of the election made, to show that he had suffered by that variance or was taken by surprise, and that injury to him resulted therefrom.

We are satisfied from a review of the evidence, direct and circumstantial, that it is sufficient to warrant the verdict of the jury.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McALPINE. (Cr. 515.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 10, 1914.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1137*)—TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY—INVITED MISCONDUCT.

The misconduct if any of the district attorney in asking questions of a witness invited by prior questions asked by accused's counsel cannot be complained of.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1171*)—APPEAL—MISCONDUCT OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY — CURING BY CONDUCT OF COUNSEL FOR ACCUSED.

The misconduct of the district attorney in asking a witness questions is cured by subsequent questions of counsel for accused, put to him when a witness in his own behalf, and bringing out the identical matter embraced in the questions complained of.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent.Dig. §§ 3126, 3127; Dec.Dig. § 1171.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

C. W. McAlpine was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. J. McDonough, of Oakland, and Henry B. Lister, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John J. Barrett, of San Francisco, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case was charged with the crime defined by section 593 of the Penal Code. He was convicted, and has appealed from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The points made in support of the appeal are the misconduct of the district attorney in asking certain questions, and that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment.

[1, 2] There is no merit in the claim that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct. Perhaps he should not have asked the questions complained of, but the record shows fairly enough that the questions complained of were invited by previous questions of counsel of the defendant. Moreover, whatever harm resulted from the asking of those questions was cured and condoned by the subsequent question of counsel for the defendant, put to the defendant when a witness in his own behalf, which brought out very emphatically and distinctly the identical matter embraced in the questions complained of. It is the settled rule that error, if any, of the kind complained of is cured by the bringing out of the same subject-matter by defendant's counsel.

As to the next contention, the court entertains no doubt that the proof on the part of the prosecution in the trial court abundantly establishes the fact that the complaining corporation was authorized to do business at its location at the time of the commission of the offense, and that it was so doing business under proper legal authority. It is contended that the evidence is further insufficient to establish the fact that the defendant was the perpetrator of the offense; but we are satisfied that the evidence upon the whole case, direct and circumstantial, amply supports the verdict and judgment in this respect.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LUX. (Cr. 531.)

Witnesses (§ 268*)—Cross-Examination of Accused—Scope of Direct Examination.

Where accused testified on her direct examination relative to her possession of the pistol with which the homicide was committed, it was proper to permit her to be cross-examined as to what she did with the pistol prior to the shooting and where she carried it on her person.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Hazel Lux was prosecuted for murder, and appeals from a judgment of conviction. Affirmed.

Gehring & Wyman, of Oakland (A. L. Frick, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. It is conceded that the evidence upon the whole case is sufficient to support the verdict; and the only point made is the alleged error in the cross-examination of the defendant. The direct examination of the defendant upon one particular point related to her possession, prior to her going to a moving picture show, of a pistol—the pistol with which it was alleged she committed the crime of murder charged against her. The direct examination unequivocally referred to this pistol and the defendant's possession of it. The court is satisfied that the cross-examination on that point was germane to the direct examination. The people were entitled to know what she did with the pistol prior to the shooting and where she carried it on her person. There is no doubt at all in our minds but that the cross-examination on that subject was legitimate and proper and without any prejudice to the defendant; and, that being the only point in the case, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. AH FONG. (Cr. 525.)

Statutes (§ 114*)—Title and Subject—Practice of Medicine.

The title of St. 1913, p. 722, regulating the practice of medicine and surgery, held sufficient to indicate the entire subject-matter of the act within the requirements of the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 145, 147–149; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Ah Fong was convicted of violating the act for the regulation of the practice of medicine and surgery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Schooler, of Chico, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Louis H. Ward, of San Francisco, of counsel), for the People.

PER CURIAM. The record shows that this is an appeal from a judgment of conviction and from an order denying the motion of the defendant for a new trial, in a case wherein the defendant was charged with violating an act for the regulation of the practice of medicine and surgery, etc., approved June 2, 1913. Stats. 1913, p. 722.

There is no merit in the contention that the statute under which the defendant was prosecuted and convicted is unconstitutional. In our judgment, the title of the act indicate with sufficient detail the entire subject-matter of the act; and we are satisfied that there is not in the body of the statute in question anything which is in conflict with it title or not included within the scope thereof.

We are also satisfied, from a reading of the entire evidence in the case, that it is sufficient to sustain the verdict and the judgment.

For these reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

TYSON et al. v. REINECKE. (Civ. 1387.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 7, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 5, 1915.)

1. Guaranty (§ 56*)—Discharge of Guarantor—Change in Obligation—"Due Date."

One interested in a corporation receiving material executed an instrument whereby he guaranteed the payment at "due date" of all accounts for goods already delivered and to be delivered to the corporation by the seller. At the time of the execution of the instrument, the seller extended to the corporation 60 days' credit. Subsequently the period of credit was changed to 30 days, with the option to the corporation at the expiration of that time to give notes for 30 or 60 days. Notes for 30 or 60 days were given. Held, that since, by the terms of the guaranty, credit was not restricted as to time, any reasonable change as to the length of credit did not relieve the guarantor from liability, unless materially changing the contract of guaranty, and the adoption of the new period of credit and execution of notes did not release the liability of the guarantor; the words "due date" meaning, in commercial transactions, that an account will be paid at the time fixed for its payment.

3. ATTACHMENT (§ 154*)—WRIT OF ATTACHMENT—AFFIDAVIT—AMENDMENTS.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by James Tyson and others, as trustees, against S. W. Reinecke. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from orders denying a new trial and refusing to discharge an attachment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for appellant. Denson, Cooley & Denson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action on a guaranty. The appeal is by defendant from a judgment and from an order denying him a new trial. Defendant also appeals from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment.

Plaintiffs are assignees of Gage, Mills & Co., a partnership, and the action is brought for the reasonable value and the alleged contract price of lumber alleged to have been sold and delivered by said partnership to the Metropolis Construction Company, a corporation, and is founded upon a written instrument of guaranty signed by defendant in the words and figures as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 21, 1909.

"Mss. Gage Mills & Co., No. 2005 Market St., City—Gentlemen: In consideration of having delivered lumber & other materials & that you will continue to deliver same to the Metropolis Construction Co. of No. 24 Cal. St.—I hereby guarantee the payment—at due date—of all the accounts for goods already delivered & to be delivered to the above Construction Co. in the future. Yours truly, A. W. Reinecke.

"Witness: Louis P. Schwerdt."

The answer admits the execution by the defendant of the said instrument of guaranty, but denies all the other material allegations of the complaint, and pleads exoneration of the guaranty under section 2819 of the Civil Code.

After trial, the court found in favor of the plaintiffs on all the issues, and judgment was accordingly entered against the defendant for the sum of $6,319.91, being the amount of plaintiffs' demand and interest from the time of commencing suit to the rendition of judgment. The defendant owned one share of stock in the Metropolis Construction Company. He was also, as he termed it, "accommodation treasurer" of the corporation, but performed none of the duties of that office. The partnership had been selling lumber to the corporation for several weeks, when W. L. B. Mills, a member of the partnership, prepared the instrument of guaranty here declared on, and sent it by Louis P. Schwerdt, a salesman of the partnership, to the defendant, with the request that the defendant should sign the same, which the defendant did. Originally, and for several months after the guaranty was made, the partnership was selling to the corporation "cash on 60 days." Subsequently, the corporation being slow in its payments, the partnership refused to give the corporation 60 days' time to pay its bills; and it was accordingly arranged between them that 30 days' time should be given the corporation when, if it could not pay, notes at between 30 days and 60 days would be accepted. Under this arrangement, the partnership accepted a series of notes from the corporation, commencing in May, 1910, and ending in November, 1910, which notes were payable in 30, 35, 45, and 60 days after date. The notes given by the corporation to the partnership to and including September, 1910, were all paid by the corporation at maturity. A note given October 31, 1910, payable in 30 days, was also paid at maturity. The corporation, however, gave, and the partnership accepted, two notes which are unpaid for goods sold in September, 1910, also two notes for goods sold in October, 1910, which are not paid. These notes were given and accepted by the partnership in each instance 30 days after the sale and for a sufficient number of days to make the day of payment in each instance more than 60 days after the sale.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] It is the contention of the defendant that these four notes, aggregating $5,100, extended the time of payment of the amount, and that the acceptance of such notes by the partnership, under the terms of section 2819 of the Civil Code, exonerated the defendant pro tanto from the guaranty.

There can be no doubt that, if what was done in this case as to each of the notes would amount to an extension of the time of payment thereof beyond what was understood by the parties to be meant by the term "due date," the defendant was exonerated, and plaintiff cannot recover. Daneri v. Gazzola, 139 Cal. 418, 73 Pac. 179; 20 Cyc. 1443. The question then to be decided calls for a construction of the term "due date." There seems to be no judicial interpretation of the meaning of the term; but it is clear that in commercial transactions, generally speaking, it means that an account will be paid at the time fixed or agreed upon for its payment. In this case, at the time the guaranty was executed, the copartnership was selling to the corporation goods upon a credit of 60 days; but there is no circumstance in the case that would warrant the conclusion that there was a usage of trade or a contract between the parties, under which the corporation was entitled to a credit upon all sales at 60 days. Schwerdt, the salesman for the partnership, who took the guaranty to the defendant to be signed, had no authority to bind the partnership to give the corporation 60 days' credit; nor did anything he said on that occasion have that effect. What he said there amounted to no more than a statement that at that time the partnership was giving the corporation 60 days' credit on all sales. Mills, who acted exclusively for the partnership concerning these matters, testified that the conversation between Schwerdt and the defendant as to the 60 days' credit was not reported back to him. If this was true, there is nothing in the record to show that the partnership knew that defendant was aware of the length of credit that was being extended to the Metropolis Construction Company; so, from the facts in the case, we hold that, even if the defendant had knowledge that the corporation was receiving 60 days' credit on all deliveries at and before the execution of the guaranty, there being no usage or understanding to the contrary, the partnership was authorized to extend the corporation credit for any reasonable length of time, and that some length of credit was contemplated by all the parties concerned.

But, as by the terms of the guaranty the credit was not limited or restricted in any respect as to time, we think that any reasonable change as to the length of the credit would not relieve the guarantor from his liability thereunder, unless such term of credit materially changed the contract of guaranty. It is not claimed that the terms, as changed, were unreasonable.

When the guaranty was executed, the period of credit was 60 days. Subsequently, in order that the corporation and the partnership might continue business relations, that period of credit was changed and a new date of payment was agreed on, namely, that 30 days' credit should be given, at the expiration of which the account was to be paid or at the option of the corporation it was to give its note for some period of time, varying according to circumstances from 30 to 60 days. Under these facts, it is apparent that the giving of the notes was a part of the new arrangement which did not, in any material respect, change the contract of guaranty, and they marked the period of credit within which the payments were to be made. This brings the guarantor within the terms of his guaranty, namely, that the accounts would be paid at "due date," and his liability follows.

[2] Coming now to the proposition of whether or not the notes may be regarded as having been given and accepted as absolute payment, little need be said. Receipts for the notes and entries in the books of account kept by the partnership refer to the notes as having been received in payment. This, with other evidence in the record, would be sufficient, no doubt, to support a finding that the notes were accepted by the partnership as payment (Jenne v. Burger, 120 Cal. 444, 52 Pac. 706), but Mr. Mills, who, as before stated, acted throughout these transactions for the partnership, denied that the notes were so accepted, and it is also in evidence that, in looking over the books of account of the concern and observing that the notes were entered therein as payment, Mills told the concern's bookkeeper that those entries were incorrect, and in the future to enter them as notes. In brief, it appears quite clear from a reading of the whole record that it was not the intention of the parties that the notes should be accepted in satisfaction of the accounts. In any event, it is certain there is a conflict in the evidence on this branch of the case, and for this reason we cannot, even if we were so inclined, disturb the finding of the court, which was against the defendant.

[3] As to the appeal from the order denying a motion to dissolve the writ of attachment issued in the above-entitled action, it appears that the ground of the motion was that the writ of attachment issued for a greater amount than that stated in the affidavit. Assuming that this was true, in which event the motion would be well founded (Finch v. McVean, 6 Cal. App. 272, 91 Pac. 1019; O'Conor v. Roark, 108 Cal. 173, 41 Pac. 465), still, as the court, under the terms of section 558 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1909, permitted an amendment of the writ which made it and the affidavit therefor agree in amount, and as we think in so doing the court acted within the authority vested in it by that section, it follows that its order cannot be disturbed.

[4] Taking up the last point made by defendant, we think it equally clear that a contract of guaranty is a contract "for the direct payment of money." It is a collateral contract for a "direct payment of money." If the payment is "direct," it is immaterial whether the obligation is principal or collateral. Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161, 167; San Francisco v. Brader, 50 Cal. 506; County of Monterey v. McKee, 51 Cal. 255; McKee v. Monterey County, 51 Cal. 275.

It follows from what has been said that the appeal from the judgment and from the order refusing a new trial, as well as the appeal from the order refusing to dissolve the attachment, should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

In re KELLY et al. (Civ. 1279.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 4, 1914.)

1. ADOPTION (§ 3*)—ABANDONED CHILDREN—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Civ. Code, § 224, defining an abandoned child, which may, without the parent's consent, be adopted, whereby the natural relation between parent and child is destroyed, is to be strictly construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adoption, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. ADOPTION (§ 7*)—"ABANDONED CHILD"—ABANDONMENT.

Within Civ. Code, § 224, defining as an "abandoned child," which may be adopted without consent of the parents, a child deserted by both parents or left in the care and custody of another by its parents, without agreement or provision for its support, for the period of one year, mere failure of parents of a child, in the care and under the custody of another, to contribute, while it is in such custody and care, to its support and maintenance for a year, does not constitute abandonment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adoption, Cent. Dig. §§ 7–10; Dec. Dig. § 7.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Abandon.]

3. ADOPTION (§ 7*)—ABANDONED CHILDREN—"ABANDONMENT."

To constitute an abandonment within Civ. Code, § 224, as to adoption of abandoned children, it must appear by clear and indubitable evidence that there has been by the parents a giving up or total desertion of the minor; that is an absolute relinquishment by the parents of custody, and control of it; and thus the laying aside by them of all care for it must be shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adoption, Cent. Dig. §§ 7–10; Dec. Dig. § 7.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Abandon.]

4. ADOPTION (§ 7*)—ABANDONED CHILDREN—ABANDONMENT—INTENTION.

Abandonment, within Civ. Code, § 224, as to adoption of abandoned children, is a question of intention, which must be shown by a clear, unequivocal, and decisive act of the parent, showing a determination not to have the benefit of the right to which he is entitled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adoption, Cent. Dig. §§ 7–10; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

5. ADOPTION (§ 13*)—ABANDONED CHILDREN—ABANDONMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held insufficient to show abandonment, within Civ. Code, § 224, as to adoption of a child abandoned by its parents.

6. ADOPTION (§ 7*)—ABANDONED CHILDREN—"AGREEMENT FOR SUPPORT."

Though not kept, a promise by the father to compensate, when able to do, persons for taking care of and supporting his child, constitutes the "agreement or provision for its support," absence of which Civ. Code, § 224, makes essential to a child being abandoned, as regards right to adopt it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

In the matter of the petition of William P. Kelly and another to have Mary Louise Donahoo, a minor child, declared an abandoned child. From a judgment for petitioners, the parents of the child appeal. Reversed.

Rowan Hardin, of Sonora, for appellants. Crittenden Hampton, of Sonora, for respondents.

HART, J. This proceeding, as its title readily indicates, was instituted by the above-named petitioners, in the superior court of Tuolumne county, for the purpose of securing the judgment of said court that one Mary Louise Donahoo, a minor, is an abandoned child within the purview of section 224 of the Civil Code; the ultimate object of the judicial declaration so sought herein being to enable said petitioners to adopt said minor. The petition alleges facts sufficient to state a case of abandonment under the section of the Civil Code above mentioned, and the same was answered and contested by the parents of the minor. At the hearing of the proceeding, evidence for and against the claims of the petition was taken, the court found that said child had been abandoned by its parents within the contemplation of said section 224 of the Civil Code, and rendered and caused to be entered judgment in accord with said finding. This appeal is prosecuted by the parents of said minor from said judgment.

The single question submitted on this appeal is whether the said minor is an abandoned child within the meaning and intent of the Code section above referred to.

Among other provisions, said section contains the following:

"Any child deserted by both parents or left in the care and custody of another by its parent or parents, without any agreement or provision for its support, for the period of one year, is deemed to be an abandoned child within the meaning of this section. * * *"

It is claimed and the petition avers that the parents of the minor concerned here left said minor in the care and custody of the petitioners, without having made any agreement or provision for its support, for a period of more than one year.

The salient facts upon which this controversy is to be determined are practically undisputed, and may be briefly stated as follows:

The minor involved in this controversy is one of twins—a boy and a girl—born to the contestants, Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Donahoo, on the 22d day of January, 1909. The mother of the twins was, after the birth thereof, left in such delicate health that she became apprehensive that she could not properly take care of and maintain both the infants, and the parents therefore came to the conclusion that the infants would fare the better by placing one in the custody and under the control of a sister of the father of the children, a Mrs. Emma Swanson, then residing in the city of Sonora. To this end, and some three weeks after the birth of the infants, the father and mother completed arrangements whereby Mrs. Swanson took the custody and assumed the responsibility of caring for and maintaining the girl baby. Shortly after the infant was given into the custody of Mrs. Swanson, and, while yet in such custody, the Donahoos departed for Los Angeles, where they took up their residence. The infant remained with Mrs. Swanson until the month of June, 1912—a period of over three years—when the latter was taken so seriously ill as to have suffered mental derangement to a degree which required her removal to and, for a brief period, incarceration in the state hospital for the insane at Stockton.

The petitioners were near neighbors of Mrs. Swanson, and so became aware of her illness immediately upon the happening thereof. They gave her much attention and did all that lay within their power to make her as comfortable as she could be made under the circumstances. They took charge of and ministered to the wants and necessities of the baby girl during Mrs. Swanson's illness and prior to her removal to the asylum. They communicated the fact of Mrs. Swanson's illness to the Donahoos, and informed them that she was greatly embarrassed financially. Upon receiving that information, the father of the child forwarded to the petitioners, for the use and benefit of Mrs. Swanson, the sum of $30. After Mrs. Swanson had been committed and taken to the asylum, the petitioner, William P. Kelly, addressed a letter to the parents of the child in which he declared that he and his wife had become greatly attached to the baby, that they had no children of their own, and that they desired to adopt the infant. To that proposition no response was made by the Donahoos, so far as the record discloses. The petitioners retained custody of the child after Mrs. Swanson was sent to the asylum and for over a year cared for and supported her. During that period a number of letters was written by the Donahoos to the petitioners concerning Mrs. Swanson and the child. In one of said letters the father of the baby explained that he had just suffered the loss of several hundred dollars through the failure of a concern for which he had been working, but that he was then working for another company, and that, "as soon as I get a pay day, I will send you more money, and as often as I do get one." He further stated in said letter that "if anything should happen to sister (referring to Mrs. Swanson) we will arrange about Louise," referring to the baby. The other letters above referred to as having been written to the Kellys by the Donahoos disclose a commendable degree of parental solicitude for the child, and, while they contained no direct statements indicative of an intention on the part of the Donahoos to compensate the petitioners for caring for and supporting the baby, the general tenor of their language does not support the conclusion that the parents intended to abandon or relinquish their right to its custody.

It appears that, a few months after being committed to the asylum, Mrs. Swanson sufficiently recovered her physical and mental health to justify her discharge from that institution, and so, in the month of December, 1912, she left the asylum and went to Fresno, where she remained until July, 1913, when, at the request of the Donahoos, she went to Sonora for the purpose of regaining possession of the child. Mrs. Swanson testified in part as follows:

> "As soon as I regained my health (after she was released from the asylum), I was in communication with Mrs. Kelly all the time relative to the welfare of the little girl. In June, 1913, arrangements were made with Mr. Donahoo to send me to Sonora to get the child, as shown by the letter from Mr. and Mrs. Donahoo to me, dated the 16th day of June and the 23d day of June, 1913. I came to Sonora about the 10th day of July for the purpose of getting the little girl, acting in behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Donahoo. I did not know that any proceedings had been commenced at that time to have the child declared an abandoned child. I was informed of such proceedings by Mr. Kelly after I reached Sonora. From my knowledge of the conditions surrounding Mr. and Mrs. Donahoo in this matter I know neither of the parents had any intention at any time of abandoning the little girl. At one time I tried to get the consent of the father and mother to adopt the little girl, but they refused to consider the matter at all. When I came to Sonora in July, 1913, Mr. Kelly told me that Mr. Donahoo had promised to pay for the care of the child, but that he had failed to keep his promise. I have recollections during lucid moments of my sickness in July, 1912, of Mrs. Kelly telling me that she and her husband would care for the child and that Mr. Donahoo had promised to pay for the care of the child. At the time I was taken sick, Mr. Donahoo was living in Los Angeles. After I regained my health, I knew Mr. Donahoo's financial condition during the latter part of the year 1912 and the early part of the year 1913, and knew that he was out of work a portion of the time and that he had sickness in the family and was unable to pay his bills. The sum of money I had in my possession at the time I was taken sick was money sent me by Mr. Donahoo. * * * Mr. Donahoo sent me money for the support of the child, and whenever I requested it he sent me money for my support."

M. J. Donahoo testified that, during the time the child was with his sister, Mrs. Swanson, he paid for its support and maintenance and at times paid for the support of Mrs. Swanson. He said that, prior to the receipt from William P. Kelly of a telegram on June 3, 1912, telling him of the illness of Mrs. Swanson, he was unaware of the latter's physical and mental condition. At that time his wife was ill in Los Angeles and he was unable to collect money which was due him, and for these reasons he did not go to Sonora to take possession of his child and to render succor to his sister.

"I knew," he continued, "the child was in good hands with Mr. and Mrs. Kelly and was satisfied that I could make settlement with them afterwards for the trouble in caring for the child, when I had means to do so. Prior to the writing of the letter of July 7th, the petitioners' Exhibit A, I wrote to Mr. Kelly asking him to contribute for the child and that I would contribute to him for it as soon as I was able. The money which I mentioned being sent in the letter marked petitioners' Exhibit B was intended to apply toward the support of the child, and in compliance with my promise to reimburse Mr. Kelly for his trouble and expense in caring for the child. At no time did I have any intention of abandoning said child, and it was my intention to come and get the child and reimburse Mr. Kelly as soon as my finances would permit. * * * I am in a position now to pay Mr. Kelly a reasonable sum per month to reimburse him for his trouble in caring and providing for said child, and I am desirous of obtaining the child and caring and providing for her. As soon as these proceedings were commenced, I tendered money to Mr. Kelly, being the sum of $10, as testified to by Mr. Kelly herein."

Both Mr. and Mrs. Kelly testified that when Mrs. Swanson was taken ill, as above explained, they found that the child had been very much neglected; that she was weak and emaciated for want of sufficient food; that she was without proper raiment and unclean of body. They declared that they had never been remunerated by her parents for the care and support they had given the child for a period of over one year, and that no provision had been at any time made by the parents for the child's care and maintenance.

The foregoing constitutes a statement in substance of all the facts and some of the testimony upon which the judgment appealed from was founded. As stated, and as must readily be observed from an examination of the above statement, there is in reality no dispute as to the facts, and the sole question is: Was the court legally justified in declaring and adjudging upon said facts that the minor involved here was an abandoned child within the meaning of section 224 of the Civil Code, supra?

We cannot persuade ourselves that the conclusion of the learned trial judge is sustainable.

[1] In the first place, it is to be remarked that a statute which authorizes, upon a showing of the existence of certain designated facts or conditions, a court to make a decree or an order whereby the natural relation between parent and child is destroyed, must be strictly construed, and is therefore to be applied in those cases only in which the precise facts or conditions prescribed by such statute are shown to exist. As is said in the case of Matter of Cozza, 163 Cal. 514, 522, 126 Pac. 161, 164 (Ann. Cas. 1914A, 214):

> "The adoption of a child was a proceeding unknown to the common law. The transfer of the natural right of the parents to their children was against its policy and repugnant to its principles. It had its origin in the civil law and exists in this state only by virtue of the statute which, as above stated, expressly prescribes the conditions under which adoption may be legally effected. Consent lies at the foundation of statutes of adoption, and under our law this consent is made absolutely essential to confer jurisdiction on the superior court to make an order of adoption, unless the conditions or exceptions exist specially provided by the statute itself and which render such consent of the parents unnecessary. Unless such consent is given, or, for the exceptional causes expressly enumerated is expressly dispensed with, the court has no jurisdiction in the matter."

While the effect of an adjudication that a minor is an abandoned child under the terms of section 224 of the Civil Code is not to directly sever the relation of parent and child, still, since the result of such adjudication under said section is to enable a third party to adopt such child without first procuring the consent of its parents, thus practically depriving the parents of any voice in the matter of an adoption, in case a proceeding for that purpose be inaugurated, that section is also to be subjected to a strict construction when its application is invoked.

[2] In the second place, we are persuaded to say that the mere failure of the parents of a minor child, in the custody and under the care of a third party, to contribute, while it is in such custody and care, to the support and maintenance of such child for a period of one year, does not itself constitute an abandonment of the minor within the purview of said section of the Code. If the rule were otherwise—that is, if an adjudication of abandonment could legally be predicated on the mere failure by the parents to support their minor children—the result, in innumerable instances, would be to work a manifest wrong upon parents. It is not difficult to conceive of circumstances wholly beyond the control of parents having the deepest affection for their children which would render it impossible for them to support their children or care for them in a proper way. It would, indeed, be a harsh rule which would, under such circumstances, authorize a judicial determination by which the natural right of the parents to the custody and control of their children would be forever severed.

[3, 4] To constitute an abandonment under said section of the Code, it must appear by clear and indubitable evidence that there has been by the parents a giving up or total desertion of the minor. In other words, there must be shown an absolute relinquishment of the custody and control of the minor, and thus the laying aside by the parents all care for it. Crabb on Synonyms; Pidge v. Pidge, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 257, 265; Sikes v. State (Tex.) 28 S. W. 688, 689; Nugent v. Powell, 4 Wyo. 173, 33 Pac. 23, 20 L. R. A. 199, 62 Am. St. Rep. 17; Dikes v. Miller, 24 Tex. 417, 424; Middle Creek Ditch Co. v. Henry, 15 Mont. 558, 39 Pac. 1054, 1058. And abandonment is a question of intention, which must be shown by a clear, unequivocal, and decisive act of the party—an act done that shows a determination not to have the benefit of the right to which he is entitled. Breedlove v. Stump, 11 Tenn. (3 Yerg.) 257, 276.

[5] We have been unable to perceive in the evidence adduced at the hearing of this proceeding a single fact which may fairly be said to indicate an intention in the parents of the child concerned here to desert said minor or relinquish their natural right to her custody, care, and control. To the contrary, according to our interpretation of the proofs, the parents not only manifested a desire to perpetuate all the consequences of the natural relation subsisting between them and the infant, but displayed commendable anxiety for its welfare.

The evidence, without dispute, shows that, fearful lest the delicate physical condition of the mother was such that she could not properly nourish the two infants born at the same time to her, the parents arranged with the sister of the father to take custody and care of the infant girl; that the father, during the period that the child was with his sister and until the latter became ill and unable to bestow proper care upon the baby, paid the custodian of said child for the service of caring for it; that, after Mrs. Swanson became ill, the father sent to the petitioners the sum of $30 which, while intended to be used for the benefit of the sick woman, was doubtless in part or perhaps in full payment of her services in caring for the infant; that the general tenor of the language of the letters from both the father and mother of the child to the petitioners, after the latter had voluntarily taken the custody of the infant, clearly indicated an intention on the part of the parents to reimburse the petitioners for their services in looking after and attending to the welfare of the child; that, as a matter of fact, the father agreed to compensate the petitioners for their services to the child whenever he found himself financially able to do so.

Under the facts as thus recapitulated, and which, as stated, stand uncontradicted, it is difficult to conceive how an adjudication that the minor in controversy is an abandoned child, or was abandoned by its parents, within the meaning of the language of section 224 of the Civil Code, can be upheld.

[6] The promise by the father of the child that he would compensate, when able to do so, the petitioners for taking care of and supporting it, constituted the "agreement or provision for its support" contemplated by said section, and the fact that the father failed to keep said promise can prove nothing but a violation of the agreement.

It may be true that the child, now approaching her sixth year, and having been with the Kellys for over a year, has formed a strong attachment for the petitioners, as they no doubt have for the child. It may also be true that the Kellys are better circumstanced than are her parents for bestowing upon her proper care. But, while these considerations might, perhaps, be of more or less importance in disposing of a guardianship proceeding, they cannot, obviously, enter into the determination of the question of adoption against the consent of the parents or of a proceeding, like the present, which, if sustained, would render it legally unnecessary to consult the desires or wishes of the parents in a proceeding looking to the adoption of their minor children by another.

We conclude that the learned trial judge erred in the conclusion crystallized in the judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted, and said judgment is therefore reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

KLAMATH LUMBER CO. v. CO-OPERATIVE LAND & TRUST CO. (Civ. 1261.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 5, 1914.)

1. Frauds, Statute of (§ 26*)—Original or Collateral Promise—Credit to Promisor.

Where the agent of a land company, accompanied by a purchaser of land from such company, in negotiating for the purchase of potato crates for the use of such purchaser, asked for credit, whereupon the seller said that, if the land company would pay him, he would do it, and the land company's agent said that that was all right, and they would do that, and the seller understood that he was selling to the land company and looked entirely to it for payment, the land company was not merely the principal debtor, but the only debtor, and there was no question of a guaranty under the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 35–42½; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. Corporations (§ 425*) — Authority of Agents—Estoppel.

Where a seller of chattels, for which the agent of a corporation agreed that the corporation would pay, though they were to be used by a third party, was told by the person having control of the corporation's business that the agent was handling the matter, and that the seller should take the matter up with him, and whatever he did would be all right, and in reliance thereon the chattels were sold, the corporation was precluded from denying the agent's authority to bind it.

3. Sales (§ 52*) — Actions for Purchase Price—Evidence.

In an action for the purchase price of chattels, in which defendant claimed that the sale was made to a third party, evidence that such third party was in Oregon in explanation of plaintiff's failure to call him as a witness was properly admitted, especially where the facts sufficiently appeared without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 118–144, 1045; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. Appeal and Error (§ 1051*)—Harmless Error—Admission of Evidence.

In an action for the purchase price of goods, in which defendant claimed the sale was made to a third party, the admission of a question asked the seller's president as to whether he had any agreement with defendant, though technically objectionable, was without prejudice, where, from the facts testified to by the witness, the conclusion necessarily followed that the agreement was with defendant and the testimony made it obvious that such was the opinion of the witness.

5. Trial (§ 203*)—Instructions—Issues.

An instruction that plaintiff brought the action to obtain a judgment against defendant for $600 alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant for the sale of potato crates, for which plaintiff alleged defendant promised to pay at the rate of 15 cents per crate, no part of which sum plaintiff alleged had ever been paid, was not improper, though it was probable that the jury had already been advised of the claim of each party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 477–479; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

6. Sales (§ 364*)—Actions for Price—Instructions.

Such instruction was not objectionable because of the failure to refer to a delivery as well as a sale, as any one would understand that "sale" implied a delivery, especially where there was no question as to the delivery of the crates; the only question being as to the party to whom they were sold.

7. Sales (§ 364*)—Actions for Price—Instructions.

In an action for the purchase price of goods, in which defendant claimed that the same was made to a third party, where there was evidence supporting plaintiff's theory of the transaction, an instruction defining an original obligation and a principal debtor and embodying plaintiff's theory was properly given, as either party has a right to an instruction based upon his theory of the case, if there is any evidence to support it.

8. Sales (§ 364*)—Actions for Price—Instructions.

In an action for the purchase price of goods which defendant claimed was sold to a third party, an instruction that if the jury were satisfied from all the evidence that defendant's promise, if any was made, was an original promise to pay for the goods, and not a conditional one, it was their duty to find that fact in favor of plaintiff could not have been understood as meaning otherwise than that they should find that the promise was an original promise, if they were satisfied from the evidence that an original promise was made.

9. Appeal and Error (§ 1064*)—Harmless Error—Instructions.

Though the instruction embodied a truism and was unnecessary, it could have done no harm.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4219, 4221–4224; Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

10. Appeal and Error (§ 1064*)—Harmless Error—Instructions.

In an action for the purchase price of goods which defendant claimed were sold to a third person, where it was admitted that they were "furnished" to the third person in the sense that they were shipped to him for use on land purchased by him from defendant, and it was defendant's contention that they were not only furnished to him, but that he alone was liable, an instruction that the fact that the goods were furnished to a third person by plaintiff was not of itself absolutely sufficient to show conclusively that the promise of defendant to pay, if any was made, was a conditional one was not prejudicial because of the reference to the furnishing of the goods to the third person as a fact, especially as such reference was favorable to defendant.

11. Sales (§ 53*)—Parties—Questions for Jury.

That potato crates sold for use by a purchaser of land from defendant as the result of negotiations between plaintiff, such purchaser, and defendant's agent were shipped to such purchaser was not conclusive that defendant's promise to pay was not an original promise, but only a conditional promise to pay, if the purchaser did not, but was merely a circumstance for the jury, and an instruction that it was not conclusive, though somewhat argumentative, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 145–151; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by the Klamath Lumber Company against the Co-operative Land & Trust Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. G. Ostrander, of Merced, for appellant.
F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was to recover the sum of $600 for certain sweet potato crates alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant. The main controversy is as to whether the crates were sold to defendant or to a certain Mr. Gutman, the evidence being sharply conflicting on this point. Closely related to the foregoing is another contention by appellant that if it ever made any promise to pay plaintiff for the crates it was a conditional one—that is, it would pay if Gutman did not—and, the proviso not being in writing, it was void by reason of subdivision 2 of section 1624 of the Civil Code.

[1] Preliminarily we may mention certain facts that are undisputed. Plaintiff was engaged in the business of retailing lumber and box materials, and the defendant principally in colonizing land, although organized for the purpose also of buying and selling personal property. One of the latter's customers was George Gutman, to whom it had sold a tract of land; the payment therefor to be made out of the crops raised. Said crops were to be marketed in the name of the corporation and the proceeds divided, one-half to be Gutman's and the other to be applied, first, on the interest, and the balance on the purchase price. Among defendant's employés was a salesman by the name of V. H. Gerard, who testified that during the time in controversy one Mr. Cone had control of defendant's business at Merced, where the crates were sold. As to the sale itself, we must, of course, accept the account that favors respondent's contention. Therefore we refer specifically to the testimony of J. H. Routt, the president and manager of plaintiff:

"About September the 5th to the 10th, in 1909, Mr. Gerard came to my office with a stranger that he introduced as Mr. Gutman, and said, 'We want to get your price on sweet potato crates,' and said that the Co-operative Land & Trust Company had sold Mr. Gutman a piece of land. * * * He spoke of Mr. Gutman as being a model farmer; the amount of crop was then growing; and I then gave him prices on sweet potato crates, car load lots to be delivered at Atwater or Livingston. The price named was 15 cents per crate. Mr. Gerard then said to me, 'There will be no money available to pay for those crates until they have made a shipment and we have received the returns, and we would like 30 days' time.' I told Mr. Gutman the prices quoted were very low and were cash prices; but I says, 'If you people [referring to the Co-operative Land & Trust Company] will pay me, I will give you the time;' and Mr. Gerard said, 'That is all right; we will do that;' and stated something of the conditions of the contract, it being a crop contract, and the money would come through their hands. Mr. Gutman had very little to say. Mr. Gerard said, 'We are not ready to close the deal with you to-day or at this time, as we want to get prices from the Merced Lumber Company, and wherever we can buy them the cheapest we will have to place the order.' They left my office, and in the afternoon I was anxious about the sale, and I went to the Co-operative Land & Trust Company's office and inquired for Mr. Gerard, but did not see him, and Mr. Cone told me that Mr. Gerard was out just then, but would possibly be in soon. I stated to Mr. Cone what I would like to see Mr. Gerard for, and I told him my conversation with Mr. Gerard at my office, and what he had said to me about Mr. Gutman farming the land and crops, and so forth, and Mr. Cone also praised Mr. Gutman very highly and seemed to think he was one of the best customers they had sold land to; * * * but Mr. Cone said: 'Mr. Gerard is handling this matter. You take the matter up with him, and whatever he does will be all right.' * * * Later I telephoned from the Klamath Lumber Company's office to Mr. Gerard. He was in the Co-operative Land Company's office and asked him about the order. He says: 'Mr. Gutman has gone home, and we have not decided just what we will do. We have quotations from the Merced Lumber Company just the same as yours, 15 cents per crate, but I will try to favor you with the business. I will turn it your way if I can. I am going out to see Mr. Gutman to-morrow morning, and I will let you know after I return.' In the afternoon of the following day Mr. Gerard called me up on the telephone and says, 'Mr. Routt, you can ship a car load of sweet potato crates to Mr. Gutman at Livingston. I asked him how many I should ship, and told him that '3,000 would make a minimum car, but we usually ship 3,500 to 4,000 crates to a car;' and he said, 'Ship 4,000;' that he would probably want more than that. * * * I ordered the crates by telephone from Sonora, and they were shipped, and when the 30 days had expired, possibly a few more, I went to Gerard and told him that the time was up, and that I would like to have our money. 'Well,' he says, 'I will see Mr. Gutman in a day or two; I don't think he has any returns or there has been any returns on the shipment of sweet potatoes.' I said, 'All right;' and in a few days after that I saw him again, and he made the same excuse; and I said: 'Mr. Gerard, I need my money and have to pay for those crates. You pay me, and then you can get your money from Mr. Gutman. I understand you get a portion of the crop anyway, and you can secure yourself. He is a stranger to me, and I am looking to you for my money, and not to Mr. Gutman.' 'All right,' he said, 'we will soon get that adjusted.' * * * I never presented any bill to Mr. Gutman in the matter; never went to see him. I make out all the bills in the office. I never wrote to him. I made no attempt to collect from Mr. Gutman, because I had an agreement with the Co-operative Company people, with Mr. Gerard, and I did not look to Mr. Gutman at all. The reason I entered up the bill in my book against Gutman is that Mr. Gerard told me to ship the shucks to Gutman. * * * I thought they were all in a sense parties to the deal, because Mr. Gerard had explained to me that the money —they had the handling of the money from the crops to some extent at least—and I expected that if there was anything due from Mr. Gutman they would collect it, and of course they, being obligated to me for the payment, would pay me. It was not my idea that I was selling to both of them. I understood that I was selling to the Co-operative Land Company for Mr. Gutman."

It would be difficult to select more apt language than the foregoing to express an agreement of sale to the defendant. The contract was made entirely with Mr. Gerard, who assumed to represent appellant. Mr. Routt declared that, "If you people (referring to defendant) will pay me, we will give you the time;" and Gerard thereupon said, "That is all right; we will do that." Furthermore it appears that Routt understood that he was selling to the Co-operative Land & Trust Company, and that he looked entirely to it for payment. It thus appears that the creditor parted with value and entered into the obligation in terms and under circumstances such as to render defendant not simply the principal debtor but the only debtor in the case.

It is equally plain that, according full credit to the testimony of Mr. Routt, no question of guaranty would arise.

[2] The only other consideration remaining as to the obligation of defendant to pay the purchase price of the crates involves the authority of Gerard to make the contract for defendant. There is no doubt, however, that Cone had full power in the premises, and his statement to Routt would bind the company and preclude any denial of Gerard's authority after plaintiff, in reliance upon it, had sold the crates.

In view of the foregoing, we do not see how it can be seriously argued that the evidence is insufficient to support the conclusion that the crates were sold to defendant; that it promised to pay for them; and that upon such promise, plaintiff relied in delivering said property.

[3] The alleged errors in the admission and rejection of testimony are hardly of sufficient gravity to merit specific notice. It was proper for plaintiff to show that Gutman was in Oregon in explanation of the circumstance that he was not called as a witness. Besides, the fact sufficiently appeared without objection.

[4] The following question was asked of Mr. Routt:

"And as president of the corporation, as the manager of the plaintiff in this action, Mr. Routt, did you have any agreement with the defendant in this action in the year 1909?"

Technically speaking, the question probably was objectionable, but the answer was entirely without prejudice, as, from the facts testified to by the witness, the conclusion necessarily followed that the agreement was with defendant, and said testimony made it obvious that such was the opinion of the witness.

[5, 6] We can see no valid objection to this instruction, given by the court on request of plaintiff:

"Plaintiff brings this action to obtain a judgment against defendant for the sum of $600, alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant for the sale of 4,000 sweet potato crates, for which plaintiff alleges defendant promised to pay; that defendant promised to pay it at the rate of 15 cents per crate, no part of which sum plaintiff alleges has ever been paid."

It was proper for the court thus to state the nature of the action although it is quite probable that the jury had already been fully advised of the claim of each party. There could be no reasonable apprehension that any sensible man would fail to understand that the term "sale" implied a "delivery" of the property. Besides, there was no controversy as to the delivery of the crates; the only question being as to whom they were sold.

[7] The instruction as to an original obligation and the principal debtor is substantially in the language of section 2794 of the Civil Code and, as a principle of law, is unobjectionable. That it embodied the theory of plaintiff as to the character of the transaction in question cannot be doubted, and that there was evidence to support that theory has already appeared. It is well settled, of course, that either party has the right to have an instruction given to the jury, based upon his theory of the case, if there is any evidence to support it. Buckley v. Silverberg, 113 Cal. 673, 45 Pac. 804.

[8, 9] We think it is plain enough to what fact the court referred in this instruction:

"If you are satisfied from all of the evidence adduced in this case that the promise of defendant, if any was made, was an original promise to pay for the crates and not a conditional one, I charge you it is your duty to find that fact in favor of plaintiff in this action."

It could hardly be understood as meaning otherwise than an instruction to find that the promise of defendant was "an original promise to pay for the crates," if the jury were satisfied from the evidence that an original promise was made by defendant. This was the important issue in the case, and while the instruction, embodying, as it does, such a truism, was not necessary, it could have done no harm. It may be said in this connection that the distinction between a guaranty and an original promise was fully set forth in instructions given by request of defendant, and nothing was left uncertain as to the meaning of those terms.

[10, 11] As we view it, the only ground for plausible criticism as to the instructions is afforded by this direction:

"The fact that the crates in question were furnished to Gutman by the plaintiff is not of itself absolutely sufficient to show conclusively that the promise of defendant, if any were made, was a conditional one."

As to the statement of fact in the first part of the instruction, it may be said that there was no dispute that the crates were "furnished" to Gutman. They were shipped to him for use on the land that he had purchased from appellant. In fact, it was the contention of defendant throughout the trial, not only that the crates were furnished to Gutman, but that he alone was liable for the purchase price. The reference to said circumstance as a fact could not therefore be prejudicial, independent of the consideration that said fact was favorable to appellant. It is true also, as a matter of law, that said fact was "not of itself absolutely sufficient to show conclusively that the promise of defendant, if any, was a conditional one." If "absolutely conclusive," all the foregoing discussion would be idle, as no other alternative would have been left the lower court but to direct a verdict for defendant. The truth is, of course, that said fact was a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether defendant was primarily liable for the purchase price of the crates, but it is not at all conclusive of the question.

There is more reason for contending that the instruction is somewhat argumentative, and for that reason should have been omitted, but it is entirely apparent from the whole charge, full, fair, and complete as it was in its entirety, that the jury were not misled by the court in any respect.

We feel satisfied that there is no substantial merit in any of the points made by appellant, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

ARENS v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 1379.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—VERDICT ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—JURY.

Where, in an action for injuries to a traveler in a collision of a street car, the traveler and his companion testified that the car gave no signal before it was about 40 feet away, rapidly approaching, and the car men testified that the usual signals were given, there was a conflict in the evidence on the issue of signals, so that the finding of the trial court would not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Albert J. Arens against the United Railroads of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Kingsley W. Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff as the result of a collision between his wagon, upon which at the time the plaintiff was riding, and a street car of the defendant being operated by its employés on Twenty-Fourth street, in the city of San Francisco.

The evidence showed that on the 11th day of October, 1906, about 2:30 o'clock in the afternoon, the plaintiff was driving his one-horse wagon on Douglass street, in that city, and turned into, and proceeded easterly along and down, Twenty-Fourth street, which at that point has a considerable downward grade. The latter street was at that time in the course of improvement, and its sides were so torn up in preparation for bituminizing as to leave the only available place for driving the space occupied by the tracks of the defendant. When the plaintiff turned into Twenty-Fourth street he looked up the street and saw the car of the defendant which traverses that street standing at the top of the grade, which is also the terminus of the car line. According to the plaintiff's testimony his attention was next directed to the car by his companion, and he then observed it within about 40 feet of his wagon, coming rapidly down the hill. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether any bell was rung or other signal given before the plaintiff thus observed the car; both the plaintiff and his companion asserting that they heard no such signal, while the employés in charge of the car asseverate that the usual signal was rung all the way down the hill. The plaintiff, upon discovering the approaching car, undertook to turn out sufficiently to permit it to pass, but failed or was unable to do so in time, and, his wagon being struck by the car, he was thrown out and injured.

Upon the trial of the case before the court without a jury the court found that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the respects averred in the complaint, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, and it thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,000, from which judgment, and from the order of the court denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

[1] The first proposition insisted upon by the appellant is that the finding of the court that the defendant was guilty of negligence in approaching the plaintiff at too high a rate of speed is not sustained by the evidence in the case. Counsel for the appellant argues at some length and with much force that the evidence upon the point is not sufficiently in conflict for the application of the familiar rule. We think, however, that a careful reading of the record shows that counsel's zeal has led him into error in this respect, and that the proofs of the plaintiff show sufficiently that the car was proceeding at a more rapid rate down the hill toward the plaintiff in plain view, and with only a limited area in which to turn aside and avoid the collision, than its operator should have gone, and hence that the finding of the court in this respect is justified by the proofs in the case.

We think also that the same is true with respect to the finding as to the warning signals given or neglected to be given. There is a sufficient conflict in this respect to require the application of the rule that the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed.

[2] The court also found in favor of the plaintiff upon the issue of contributory negligence; and upon this branch of the case counsel for both parties have presented elaborate arguments, citing many authorities dealing with the law of the road and the "last clear chance" of avoiding the collision. We are of the opinion, however, that the Supreme Court of this state has relieved this court of the necessity of an exhaustive review of the cases cited by respective counsel herein by its recent decision in the case of O'Connor v. United Railroads of San Francisco, 141 Pac. 809. This was a case almost exactly identical with the case at bar, and in which counsel for the respective parties were the same, and in which also practically the same line of authorities was cited and relied upon on each side. The law laid down by the Supreme Court as controlling that case must be regarded by this court as controlling this one in every essential particular relied upon by the appellant herein.

It follows that the judgment and order denying a new trial must be, and they are hereby, affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by William M. Hatfield against the People's Water Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 144 Pac. 300.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, H. A. Luttrell and Milton Shepardson, both of Oakland, for appellant. McKee & Tasheira, of Oakland, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant after the refusal of the plaintiff to amend his complaint in compliance with an order of the court below sustaining the defendant's demurrer. Plaintiff's cause of action is based upon an alleged violation by the defendant of those constitutional provisions (Const. art. 14, §§ 1, 2), which prohibit the collection by a public service corporation of a rate for water in excess of that fixed by a city council. The action is for damages, and the prayer of the complaint is for an injunction restraining the defendant from shutting off the plaintiff's water supply and prohibiting the collection of any rate whatsoever from the plaintiff.

[1, 2] The demurrer was properly sustained. The complaint in part and in substance alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of certain premises in the city of Oakland; that the city council passed a resolution fixing water rates for the year commencing July 1, 1906; that during the six months' period from July 1, 1906, to January 2, 1907, he was furnished water by the Contra Costa Water Company, the predecessor in interest of the defendant, and charged at the rate of $2.30 per month; that by the resolution of the city council fixing water rates only $1.69¾ per month could be lawfully charged and collected, and that therefore the plaintiff had paid for water served to him during the six months mentioned an excess rate aggregating the sum of $3.62; that subsequent to the charging and collecting of such excess rate the defendant, as the successor in interest of the Contra Costa Water Company, has been continuously attempting to collect "rates of compensation in excess of the rate fixed by said council each year thereafter and during the present year," and that said defendant "during the present year" threatens to and will, unless restrained, refuse to supply the plaintiff with water until he pays the rate demanded. Undoubtedly it was the duty of the defendant to furnish the plaintiff with water upon the payment or tender of the established legal rates, and clearly, therefore, the fact of the establishment of those rates was an indispensable element of the plaintiff's cause of action. It will be noted that the plaintiff's complaint does not allege that the city council, subsequent to the year in which the alleged excess was charged and collected ever passed a resolution announcing the rates for the succeeding years, and furthermore it is impossible to ascertain from the allegations of the complaint what, if any, were the fixed legal rates for those years. The general allegation of the complaint that "during the last three years and more" the defendant has been attempting to collect rates in excess of the rates fixed each year, without specifying what such fixed rates were, is a mere conclusion of the pleader, which cannot be availed of to initiate and invite an issue of fact.

[3] The complaint does not state a cause of action sufficient to support a judgment enjoining the defendant from making and collecting any water rate at all for water served to the plaintiff subsequent to the alleged collection of the excess rate from the plaintiff. On this phase of the case it is the plaintiff's contention that the mere charging and collecting as alleged of a rate for water in excess of the rate permitted by the Constitution ipso facto operated as a forfeiture of the works and franchises of the defendant, and that, therefore, the right thereafter to collect any rate at all should be denied the defendant. The contention was by this court in effect decided adversely to the plaintiff in the case of Hatfield v. People's Water Co., 144 Pac. 300, where it was held that the identical conduct complained of in the present case did not ipso facto operate to produce a forfeiture of the works and franchises of the defendant. If we were correct in the conclusion reached in the case cited, it follows that the complaint in the present case does not state a cause of action sufficient to support an injunction prohibiting the defendant from charging and collecting any water rate whatsoever upon the theory that its right to do so expired with the forfeiture of its franchises and works.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 87*)—EXCLUSIVE AGENCY CONTRACT—COMMISSION—SALES AFTER TERMINATION OF AGENCY.

Under an exclusive agency contract entitling the agent to a commission on all automobiles sold within a certain territory, the agent was not entitled, in the absence of bad faith, to a commission on a sale made after termination of the contract, though the agent, during the life of the contract, had made an unsuccessful attempt to sell a car to the same purchaser.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 87*)—EXCLUSIVE AGENCY CONTRACT—COMMISSION.

That such agent, by selling a car during the life of the contract, had caused the purchaser to become acquainted with the principal did not entitle the agent to commission on cars sold by the principal's successor, after termination of the agency, to such purchaser's father.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by W. J. Parry against the American Motors California Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendant and denial of new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Langan & Mendenhall, of Hayward, for appellant. Street & Street, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an action to recover $2,400, and interest thereon, for commissions alleged to be due the plaintiff upon sales of automobiles.

On May 26, 1911, the San Francisco branch of the American Motors Company, by agreement in writing, appointed the plaintiff and one F. E. Romie its exclusive representatives for Alameda county for the sale of the "American" automobile, under the terms of which appointment it is claimed that the San Francisco branch of the American Motors Company and the defendant became indebted to said Romie and plaintiff in the sum of $2,400. Subsequently, and prior to the commencement of this action, defendant took over the business of the San Francisco branch of the American Motors Company and assumed all its liabilities. Prior to the commencement of this suit F. E. Romie assigned to plaintiff his interest in the alleged demands of Parry and himself against the San Francisco branch of the American Motors Company and defendant. The findings of the trial court were against the plaintiff, and judgment accordingly went in favor of the defendant. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The contract upon which the action is based, and which was entered into by the assignor of the defendant as party of the first part and the plaintiff and his assignor as parties of the second part, provides, among other things, as follows:

"First. We hereby appoint second parties as our exclusive selling representative for Alameda county, state of California, for the purposes of handling American cars therein, and we agree:

"Second. To allow said second parties a discount of 15% from the regular current catalogue list price for the various models of cars manufactured by the American Motors Company at Indianapolis, Indiana, said price to be f. o. b. the factory. * * *

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"Fourth. In view of the fact that the above territory lies so close to San Francisco, it might be deemed expedient at times for some of the selling force of the first party to enter into said territory and make a sale therein, in which case second parties are to receive 7½% commission on said sale, provided same is made at regular retail price established by the factory. In case a sale is made at a less price the commission payable to second parties shall be agreed upon specially each time in advance of any such sale. * * *

"Seventh. To allow said second parties the privileges of selling in open territory whenever possible."

The regular retail price of the three types of cars involved here was agreed at the trial to be as follows: The 50 H. P. car, $4,250; the 1912 model, 30 H. P. car, $2,400, and the 1913 model, 30 H. P. car, $2,475. It is also admitted that the defendant and his predecessor sold to residents of Alameda county during the term of plaintiff's contract, as follows: To Herman Hess, a 50 H. P. car, for $3,583.95, the retail price being $4,250; to W. S. Heywood, a 50 H. P. car, for $2,785.32, the retail price being $4,250; to Stanley Gaune, a 50 H. P. car, for $3,048.13, the retail price being $4,250; to E. L. Brock, a 30 H. P. car, for $2,166.60, the retail price being $2,400.

[1] The plaintiff and his assignor also claimed to have sold Mrs. C. E. Gilman a 30 H. P. car, of the model 1913, for the regular retail price. Concerning this transaction, it seems that during the absence of Mr. Gilman from home the plaintiff called on Mrs. Gilman and had her sign a contract for the purchase of a car. When Mr. Gilman returned and learned what had occurred he told the defendant company that the contract had been entered into without his consent, that therefore he would have absolutely nothing to do with it, and that he would not take an American car under any conditions. No car was sold to Mrs. Gilman. About three months after the termination of the plaintiff's contract, however, the defendant persuaded Mr. C. E. Gilman to buy a car. There is no intimation in the record that the contract of purchase was entered into after the expiration of the agency with the view of affecting the question of commissions.

[2] Two cars were sold by the defendant's predecessor to Herbert Von Loan, one for $2,016.45 and the other for $2,036.55 the retail price of each being $2,400. The plaintiff and his assignor had sold E. Von Loan a car prior to this sale, and it was through that transaction that he became acquainted with the San Francisco concern. Thereafter, desiring to help his son, Herbert Von Loan, to establish himself in business, Von Loan and his son called at the San Francisco establishment, with the view of purchasing two cars and of getting the agency of the American car for Modoc county, where they lived. After some negotiations the cars were sold to Herbert Von Loan under his regular agency contract and paid for by his father. In any event, the Von Loans were not residents of Alameda county, and the evidence does not show that the sales were effected through the efforts of the plaintiff and his assignor.

It was stipulated at the trial of the case by counsel for the plaintiff that no agreement was made between the parties here concerned as to the commission which plaintiff and Romie should receive on account of sales of cars sold in San Francisco by defendant and his predecessor to residents of Alameda county at a price less than the regular retail price established by the factory.

Plaintiff claims that the evidence does not support the findings, and the main points argued in the briefs are: (1) Are sales made to residents of Alameda county, but negotiated outside of the county, within the terms of the agency? and (2) if they are, does the contract of agency fix a commission therefor?

As to the Gilman transaction, it does not appear from the record where the sale was made, but even if it were made in Alameda county, we do not conceive how it can be held that plaintiff is entitled to recover commissions for this sale, since it clearly appears that the transaction did not occur during the life of the agency.

As to the cars sold to Von Loan, from the testimony already alluded to, it must be held that there is ample evidence to sustain the view that the agents were not the moving cause of the sale.

[3] As to the remainder of the sales, it appears that they were made by the defendant or its predecessor at San Francisco to residents of Alameda county and for less than the regular retail price. As to these plaintiff claims that under the terms of the contract he is entitled to 7½ per cent. commission.

The contract between the parties reserved the right to the company to enter Alameda county for the purpose of selling its cars therein, and provided that whenever its selling force should enter that territory and make sales of cars therein at the regular retail price as established by the factory, the agents should be entitled to a commission of 7½ per cent. The contract, however, further provides that in case a sale is made at a figure less than the regular retail price the commission payable shall be agreed upon in advance of any such sale.

The evidence as to the sale of these cars, however, shows that, although sold to residents of Alameda county, the sales were made in San Francisco. It is not shown by the plaintiff that in order to effect these sales the defendant's representatives or employés entered the territory of the plaintiff. We think, therefore, that such sales do not come within the terms of the contract, so as to entitle the plaintiff to a commission or discount thereon. This was the rule followed by the Supreme Court in Haynes Automobile Co. v. Woodill Automobile Co., 163 Cal. 102, 124 Pac. 717, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 971, where it is said:

> "In the absence of any trade usage to the contrary, an agent to whom a manufacturing concern has given the exclusive sale of its products within a given territory is not entitled to commission on a sale made by the manufacturer outside of such territory, to a resident thereof."

Similarly, in the case at bar, there is no evidence of a trade usage, or that a person who has appointed an exclusive agent for a given territory is thereby prevented from dealing outside of the limits of that territory with a resident thereof.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Civ. 1364.)

1. Municipal Corporations (§ 58*)—Charter—Effect as State Law.

A charter framed and adopted pursuant to Const. art. 11, is not a law passed by a municipality, but is a law of the state, having the same force and effect as a law directly enacted by the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 145–147; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. Statutes (§ 4*)—Constitution as Limitation on Power.

The state Constitution is not a grant of power, but rather a limitation on powers of the Legislature, and it is competent for the Legislature to exercise all powers not forbidden by the state and federal Constitutions or delegated to the general government.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 57*)—Charter—Conflict with General Laws.

A municipal charter framed under Const. art. 11, may, unless prohibited by some provision of the Constitution expressed or necessarily implied therefrom, contain any provision not in conflict with, or covered by, general laws of the state; hence a charter provision providing for compensation of school directors in furtherance of the general law relating to schools, and not forbidden by the Constitution, is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 148; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

4. Municipal Corporations (§ 57*) — Charters—Compensation of School Directors —"Municipal Officer."

A provision of a charter framed under Const. art. 11, providing for compensation to city school directors, is not invalid on the theory that such provision should be covered by general laws because the school system is necessarily a state affair, since a school director is purely a "municipal officer," and his compensation is exclusively controlled by charter provisions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 148; Dec. Dig. § 57.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Officer.]

5. Statutes (§ 90*)—Special Laws—Municipal Charters—Compensation of Officer.

Where a municipal charter, as a whole, is germane to the purpose of its creation, and its various sections are subordinate to, and in harmony with, the fundamental and statutory law, and affect all persons and things alike in the particulars provided for, the objection that such charter or any provision thereof such as fixing compensation of school directors is special legislation under Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 28, is not tenable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 98–100; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by Herman I. Stern against the Council of the City of Berkeley and J. Stitt Wilson and others, as members of the Council. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an alternative writ, petitioner appeals. Reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer and require respondents to answer.

Vincent Surr and William H. Bryan, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Redmond C. Staats, of Berkeley, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. The appellant in this proceeding is a school director of the city of Berkeley. He sought by a petition for writ of mandate presented to the superior court of Alameda county to compel the respondents, as members of the city council, to issue to him a warrant upon the city treasury for his salary as school director. An alternative writ was issued, a demurrer to which was sustained without leave to amend; and this appeal is from the judgment thereupon entered.

Petitioner's claim to the salary in controversy is based on section 19 of article 5 of the charter of the city of Berkeley, which provides that:

> "Each school director shall receive five dollars for each regular meeting of the board of education which he shall attend, provided that he shall not receive more than fifteen dollars in any month."

The question here involved is the validity of this provision, considered in conjunction with the Constitution of the state, as such Constitution existed prior to the amendment in October, 1911, of subdivision 2 of section 8½ of article 11, which amendment reads as follows:

> (1) "It shall be competent in all charters framed under authority given by section 8 of article 11 of this Constitution, to provide, in addition to those provisions allowable by this Constitution and by the laws of this state, as follows: * * * (2) For the manner in which, the times at which, and the terms for which the members of boards of education shall be elected or appointed, * * * and for the number which shall constitute any one of such boards."

This subdivision, as amended in October, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 2166), expressly declares that it shall be competent in all charters framed under authority of section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution to provide for the qualifications, compensation, and removal of members of boards of education. It thus appears that prior to the amendment in question the power of city charters to fix the compensation of members of boards of education was not in express terms given by the Constitution. It is not contended, however, upon behalf of the respondents that the amendment referred to is retroactive, or that it in any wise affects the constitutionality of the charter provisions in controversy here. It is the contention of respondents that, before the amendment to the Constitution in the particulars stated, a municipal corporation was not authorized to provide for the payment of salaries to school directors; and therefore it is argued that the charter provision in question had no basis for its enactment and is therefore void. The charter provision in question must be upheld, unless it is clearly shown to have been at the time of its enactment repugnant to, and inconsistent with, the then existing fundamental law.

[1] A charter framed and adopted pursuant to the constitutional provisions is not a law passed by a municipality. It is a law of the state, having the same force and effect as a law directly enacted by the Legislature. As was said in Ex parte Sparks, 120 Cal. 395, 399, 52 Pac. 715, 716, 717:

> "It is clear that it is made a law by the Legislature, and becomes a law by this expression of the sovereign will of the state. It prevails and has force as a law of the state, and is not made a law by the people of the municipality by virtue of authority delegated to them. It is proposed by the municipality, and is accepted and passed into a law by the Legislature or rejected, as it shall see fit."

See, also, Sheehan v. Scott, 145 Cal. 684, 685, 79 Pac. 350; Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 58 Pac. 923; Frick v. Los Angeles, 115 Cal. 512, 47 Pac. 250.

[2, 3] Our Constitution is not a grant of power, but, rather a limitation upon the powers of the Legislature; and it is competent for the Legislature to exercise all powers not forbidden by the Constitution of the state or delegated to the general government or prohibited by the Constitution of the United States. Accordingly it has been held that, unless prohibited by some provision of the Constitution expressed or necessarily implied from its terms, a municipal charter adopted as provided in article 11 of the Constitution may contain any provision not in conflict with, or covered by, general laws of the state. Los Angeles v. Longden, 148 Cal. 380, 83 Pac. 246. It is true that the Legislature, in keeping with the general provisions of the Constitution, has provided a general system of laws concerning the creation and conduct of the common schools of the state. These laws are controlling and conclusive over conflicting charter provisions; but the charter of a city or of a city and county may provide for matters not enumerated in the general laws and not in conflict therewith. McKenzie v. Board of Education, 1 Cal. App. 407, 82 Pac. 392; Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 Pac. 558. The power of charters to so provide extends to all cases where the purpose of the provision is in furtherance of the purpose of the general laws of the state. Los Angeles School District v. Longden, supra. In the present case the charter provision in question is obviously in furtherance of the school system adopted by the state, and does not conflict with the general laws relating to and regulating the same. There is no general law with respect to the compensation to be paid to school directors or trustees. The general laws relating to and regulating the state school system nowhere limit or deny the right of a municipality or of the legislative power acting through a freeholder's charter to make provision for the payment of salaries to school trustees or directors.

[4] It is further contended upon behalf of the respondents that, inasmuch as the public school system of the state has been made, by the Constitution and general laws, a matter of general concern, the regulation of that system is a state affair, as distinguished from a municipal affair, and therefore can be rightfully covered and controlled only by general state laws. Generally speaking, this may be so; but, in our opinion, appellant, as a school director of the city of Berkeley, is a municipal officer, irrespective of whether or not the duties of the office are exacted by the charter or imposed by the general law of the state, and therefore the compensation to be paid him by the city out of the city treasury for services rendered the city in maintaining its school system as an integral part of the state school system is purely a municipal affair, which is exclusively controlled by charter provisions. Trefts v. McDougald, 15 Cal. App. 584, 115 Pac. 655.

[5] The further contention that the charter provision in question is a special law, and is therefore unconstitutional under subdivision 28 of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution, is untenable. Necessarily the charters of the various cities throughout the state must differ in many minor details in order to conform to the varying needs of different localities. Such differences, however, will not operate to bring each of the many existing city charters within the category of special legislation. Where a municipal charter, as a whole, is germane to the purpose of its creation, and its various sections are subordinate to, and in harmony with, the fundamental and statutory law of the state, and affect all persons and things alike in the particulars provided for, the objection that such charter or any provision thereof is special legislation cannot be successfully maintained. Potwin v. Johnson, 108 Ill. 70; People ex rel. v. Hoffman, 116 Ill. 587, 5 N. E. 596, 8 N. E. 788, 56 Am. Rep. 793; Ladd v. Holmes, 40 Or. 167, 66 Pac. 714, 91 Am. St. Rep. 457; Nichols v. Walter, 37 Minn. 264, 33 N. W. 800.

Respondents' contention that the petition does not show that the city of Berkeley has any funds from which his claim could be paid is answered by the petition itself, which alleges that there are moneys in the general fund for this purpose.

What we have thus far said, in effect, covers and disposes of the remaining points made upon behalf of the respondents. In conclusion, it may be said that we have been cited by opposing counsel to all of the decisions of our appellate courts relating to powers conferred under various charter provisions. It would be a matter of supererogation to reassert the doctrines laid down in those cases. We are satisfied that nothing contained in the legislative enactments or in any of the expressions of opinion of the courts of last resort upon the subject in hand conflicts with the conclusions we have reached here.

For the reasons stated, it is ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed, with instructions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer and require the respondents to answer.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

WALTZ v. SILVEIRA et al. (Civ. 1382.)

1. SALES (§ 477*) — CONDITIONAL SALE — BREACH OF CONTRACT—REMEDIES OF SELLER —ELECTION.

Where the seller sued for the price of a safe sold with a condition that title should remain in the seller until payment, he thereby waived his right to a return of the safe in good condition on default by the buyer in making payments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1411–1417; Dec. Dig. § 477.*]

2. SALES (§ 347*)—PURCHASE-MONEY NOTE—CONSIDERATION—DESTROYED.

Where a safe in consideration of which a note was given was so damaged by fire as to render it useless for the purpose for which it was intended and used, the consideration for the note was destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 962–972; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 165*) — MOTION FOR NONSUIT — PROBATIVE EFFECT OF EVIDENCE—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

That the evidence of the destruction of the consideration for the note sued on was developed on cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses did not lessen its probative effect or preclude the court from considering it in passing on a motion for nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 373, 374; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

4. SALES (§ 439*) — IMPLIED WARRANTY — BREACH—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in an action on a note for the price of a safe, defendant cross-complained, alleging that the safe was bought to protect jewelry, and that, through defects of construction unknown to defendant, jewelry stored in the safe was damaged by fire, for which damage judgment was prayed, the burden was on defendant to establish the implied warranty given to a purchaser of personal property by Civ. Code, §§ 1767, 1769, by proof that plaintiff knew of such defects.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1258–1260; Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 977*)—ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL—PRESUMPTION.

Where an order granting a new trial on a motion based in part on insufficiency of the evidence is general in its terms, it must be assumed on appeal that the new trial was granted for insufficiency of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3860–3865; Dec. Dig. § 977.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 933*)—DISCRETIONARY RULING—GRANTING NEW TRIAL.

A general order granting a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal, in the absence of a showing of an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3425, 3426, 3772–3776; Dec. Dig. § 933.*]

7. SALES (§ 441*)—WARRANTY—BREACH—EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

In an action on a note for the price of a jeweler's safe, wherein defendant counterclaimed for damages to jewelry stored in the safe, relying on breach of the warranty of reasonable fitness given by Civ. Code, § 1770, evidence that the safe was destroyed and its contents damaged by fire was not conclusive as to whether the safe was reasonably fit for its purpose, where there was evidence that no so-called fireproof safe could go through a fire such as that in question without serious damage to the safe and its contents.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Charles Waltz against Anna L. Silveira and another. From a judgment of nonsuit and the denial of a new trial, plaintiff appeals, and from the granting of a new trial after judgment for defendants on cross-complaint, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. M. Parcells, of San Francisco, and B. F. Griffins, of Richmond, for plaintiff. Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, C. C. Hamilton, of Oakland, F. I. Lemos, of Hayward, and H. F. Chadbourne, of San Francisco, for defendants.

LENNON, P. J. The plaintiff in this action sought to recover from the defendants the sum of $315, alleged to be the balance due and unpaid of the purchase price of a fireproof safe which had been sold and delivered to the defendants pursuant to the terms of a contract of conditional sale. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and this appeal in part is from the judgment thereupon entered that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and from an order denying a new trial.

The material averments of the plaintiff's complaint were admitted by the answer of the defendants; but, as a special defense to the action, they pleaded the destruction of the safe by fire without fault on their part. By the terms of the contract the defendants, as part of the purchase price, gave in exchange an old safe valued at $375, and paid the sum of $105 in cash. Thereupon the defendants, as required by the contract, executed to the plaintiff 12 promissory notes, each for the sum of $35, payable monthly, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum until paid. Only three of the notes were due and had been paid at the time of the fire. After the fire the defendants refused to pay the remaining 9 notes, aggregating the sum of $315, upon the theory that, the safe having been destroyed through no fault of theirs, the consideration for the notes had failed. By the terms of the contract title to the safe was to remain in the plaintiff until the last of the promissory notes had been paid.

[1] It is conceded to be the law that, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, the risk accompanies the title to property, and that, "where there is a mere agreement to sell, and title therefore has not passed, the loss falls upon the vendor." Potts, etc., Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 324, 104 Pac. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609. But it is contended that the evidence adduced in support of the plaintiff's case did not show that the safe sold to the defendants had been actually destroyed, and that, even if it had been destroyed, the nonsuit should not have been granted because of a covenant in the contract in controversy to return the safe to the plaintiff in good order "in any event."

Upon the failure or refusal of the defendants to meet the payment of the notes provided for in the contract, the plaintiff had one of two remedies: he might recover the possession of the safe; or, waiving the conditions of the contract, consider the sale as absolute, and sue for the balance of the purchase price as evidenced by the notes. The plaintiff could not have both remedies. Parke, etc., Co. v. White River Lumber Co., 101 Cal. 37, 35 Pac. 442; Holt Mfg. Co. v. Ewing, 109 Cal. 353, 42 Pac. 435; Muncy v. Brain, 158 Cal. 300, 110 Pac. 945; Elsom v. Moore, 11 Cal. App. 377, 105 Pac. 271. Having elected to proceed against the defendants for the purchase price of the safe plaintiff thereby exercised his option to treat the transaction as an absolute and completed sale. Consequently he must be held to a waiver of the alternative condition of the contract, to the effect that the defendants would upon default of the payments provided for or "in any event" return the safe in good condition.

[2] During the presentation of the plaintiff's case the fact was developed without conflict that the building in which the safe had been placed by the defendants was, without fault on their part, destroyed by fire, and that, as a result of the fire, the safe, without fault on the part of the defendants, was damaged to such an extent as to render it useless for the purpose for which it was intended, purchased, and used. This being so, the safe was destroyed within the meaning of the law. Manchester Fire Assur. Co. v. Feibelman, 118 Ala. 308, 23 South. 759; Williams v. Hartford Ins. Co., 54 Cal. 442, 35 Am. Rep. 77; London, etc., Ins. Co. v. Heckman, 64 Kan. 388, 67 Pac. 879; Palatine Ins. Co. v. Weiss, 109 Ky. 464, 59 S. W. 509; O'Keefe v. London, etc., Ins. Co., 140 Mo. 558, 41 S. W. 922, 39 L. R. A. 819; Thuringia v. Malott, 111 Ky. 917, 64 S. W. 991, 55 L. R. A. 277.

[3] The destruction of the safe was a fact developed in evidence upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses; but this did not lessen its value as evidence, nor preclude the trial court from considering it when passing upon the motion for nonsuit. The motion for nonsuit was rightfully granted.

[4] The defendant Anna L. Silveira cross-complained against the plaintiff, and for a cause of action alleged substantially that the safe described in the contract referred to in the plaintiff's complaint was intended and purchased for the express purpose of protecting a stock of watches and jewelry against damage by fire; that the safe was not fireproof, and was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was sold and purchased, because of certain defects existing in the material and construction of the safe which were unknown to the defendant and cross-complainant; that, owing to the unfitness of the safe for the purpose for which it was agreed to be sold and was sold, a stock of jewelry stored therein was damaged by the fire referred to in the sum of $3,000. This phase of the case was tried with a jury under a stipulation of the parties that any evidence offered and received upon the whole case should apply to every phase of the case. A verdict for $1,500 was rendered in favor of the defendant and cross-complainant, Anna L. Silveira. Thereafter the plaintiff and cross-defendant moved for and was granted a new trial upon this phase of the case. The defendant and cross-complainant has appealed.

[5, 6] The motion for a new trial of the issues involved in the cross-complaint was grounded in part upon the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The order granting a new trial was general in its terms, and therefore we must assume that the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict in favor of the defendant and cross-complainant appealed to and prompted the court below to grant a new trial. A general order granting a new trial will not be disturbed, in the absence of a showing of an abuse of discretion. It would serve no useful purpose to detail the evidence upon which the defendant and cross-complainant relies to support the verdict. It was the defendant and cross-complainant's contention in the court below, and it is her contention here, that the safe in controversy at the time of its purchase and sale contained undisclosed latent defects in its materials and construction, and, as a consequence, was not reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was sold. In this behalf it will suffice to say that it was not disputed at the trial that the safe in controversy was bought and sold as a fireproof safe for the express purpose of safeguarding a stock of jewelry; and it must be conceded that the evidence adduced in support of the allegations to the cross-complaint shows without conflict that the safe was destroyed and its contents damaged by fire. The fact that the safe was destroyed by fire, in the sense that it was no longer fit for the use for which it was intended and purchased, may have been some evidence of the existence of a latent defect; but the record is barren of any evidence showing, or tending to show, that the plaintiff and cross-defendant had any knowledge of the existence of a latent defect in the material and construction of the safe. The burden of proving that fact was at all times on the defendant and cross-complainant; and, in the absence of such proof, it cannot be held that the verdict of the jury was justified upon the theory that it was rightfully based upon proof of the breach of the implied warranty given to a purchaser of personal property by the provisions of sections 1767 and 1769 of the Civil Code.

[7] The case of the defendant and cross-complainant, in so far as it concerned the alleged breach of the statutory warranty, given by section 1770 of the Civil Code, that the safe was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was sold, was rested upon proof of the fact that the safe was destroyed and its contents damaged by fire. This undoubtedly was evidence that the safe was not absolutely fireproof; but such evidence was neither controlling nor conclusive upon the issue as to whether or not the safe was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was sold. Upon this phase of the case expert witnesses for the plaintiff and cross-defendant testified, in effect, that the safe in controversy was reasonably fireproof, and that neither it nor any other so-called fireproof safe could go through the fierce flames of an extraordinary fire such as occurred in the present case without serious damage to the safe and its contents. In brief, the best that can be said for the defendant and cross-complainant is that the evidence upon the issue under discussion was in substantial conflict; and, in the absence of an apparent abuse of discretion, it is the rule that an order granting a new trial grounded upon the insufficiency of the evidence is, in the presence of a substantial conflict in the evidence, conclusive upon this court. Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 412, 35 Pac. 1024; Von Schroeder v. Spreckels, 147 Cal. 186, 81 Pac. 515; Estate of Everts, 163 Cal. 449, 125 Pac. 1058.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the State Savings & Commercial Bank, a corporation, against Elisabeth F. Winchester and Frank Winchester. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

F. A. Cutler and F. R. Sweasey, both of San Francisco, for appellant. E. A. Bridgford, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The action was one to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendant and respondent, Elisabeth F. Winchester, as security for the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $11,500, made by the Main-Winchester-Stone Company, as maker, and the respondent as indorser and guarantor. The execution of both the note and mortgage was an admitted fact in the case; but as a defense to the foreclosure proceedings, it was alleged that the note and mortgage were executed without consideration to either the respondent Elisabeth F. Winchester or to the Main-Winchester-Stone Company, and that the same were both obtained by false and fraudulent representations.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The facts leading up to the transaction in suit, and out of which the claim of fraud arises, are, in substance as follows: On December 13, 1906, A. G. Stoll, the then president and general manager of the Main-Winchester-Stone Company, made application to the appellant bank upon behalf of said company for a credit loan of $15,000. The application for the loan was approved; and a credit was thereupon given to the Main-Winchester-Stone Company upon the books of the bank in the sum mentioned, for which three notes were executed in different sums to the bank by Stoll in the name of the company. Thereafter, these notes were taken up with a renewal note of said company for $15,000, which renewal note was indorsed by A. G. Stoll, R. P. Grubb, a Mr. Richardson, and Frank Winchester, all directors of the Main-Winchester-Stone Company. After the sum of $3,500 had been paid and indorsed thereon, Richardson, having sold his stock in the Main-Winchester-Stone Company, desired to be released as an indorser of said renewal note. The bank thereafter released him, in consideration of the giving by respondent Elisabeth F. Winchester of the mortgage in question, as security for the payment of the indebtedness due upon the renewal note. A second renewal note was thereupon executed in the sum of $11,500, upon which the name of Elisabeth F. Winchester replaced that of Richardson as indorser, and at the same time and as a part of the same transaction, the mortgage in question was executed as security therefor. The indorsement of the second renewal note and the execution of the mortgage by respondent were in lieu of the prior indorsement of Richardson. The trial court found that Stoll as the president and general manager of the Main-Winchester-Stone Company was without authority to execute the first renewal note in controversy, that said company never received any benefit from the money obtained upon the note, and that the same was procured to be signed by fraud and through false and fraudulent representations. In support of and as a basis for this finding, the trial court also found that prior to the execution of the original notes involved in the transaction, A. G. Stoll, C. P. Hagg, who was the then secretary of the appellant bank, and other persons, had entered into an agreement to secure control of the appellant bank by purchasing a certain amount of its capital stock; that the loan procured by Stoll, to and in the name of the Main-Winchester-Stone Company, from the appellant bank, was procured and used by him for the purpose of purchasing a controlling interest in the appellant bank, and not for the use and benefit of said company; that, in order to conceal and cover up this phase of the transaction, Stoll, on January 15, 1907, represented to the Main-Winchester-Stone Company that it was necessary to borrow $15,000 from the appellant bank, to be used in the business of the company; that he could secure such a loan from the appellant bank if a resolution were passed authorizing the same; that such resolution was duly passed authorizing a loan from the appellant bank not to exceed $15,000; and that such resolution made no reference to past loans made by appellant bank to the Main-Winchester-Stone Company. It was further found that all subsequent notes made by said Main-Winchester-Stone Company to appellant bank, including the note and mortgage in suit and the indorsements and guaranties thereon, were made without any knowledge on the part of the makers thereof, of the transaction of December, 1906, but that such notes, indorsements, guaranties, and mortgage were made in the belief that the money borrowed, guaranteed, and secured had been procured by Stoll under the resolution of January 15, 1907, that, in fact, no loans were made by appellant bank under said resolution, and that the only money appellant bank parted with was the sum advanced in December, 1906. Upon these facts judgment went for defendants.

[1] It is conceded by appellant that a corporation can act only through its board of directors, and that the public generally act at their peril with one purporting to represent such corporation without evidence of his being authorized by the governing board of such corporation. It is insisted, however, that the evidence shows that the Main-Winchester-Stone Company so conducted itself as to be estopped from denying that Stoll had authority to make the loan for want of the proper resolution. On the other hand, it is the contention of the defense that the money obtained from the appellant bank by Stoll and claimed to have been wrongfully diverted from the use of the Main-Winchester-Stone Company was advanced by the bank for the individual use of one of the directors of the company with the knowledge of the bank.

[2] The trial court adopted the view that, inasmuch as Hagg was secretary of the appellant bank, any knowledge gained by him in the transaction with Stoll was imputable to the bank. In this behalf, as previously stated in substance, the trial court found that arrangements were made between Hagg, the secretary of the appellant bank, and Stoll and others prior to the loan of December, 1906, to get control of the bank; but Stoll was without the necessary funds to pay for his proportion of the stock; that in the making of the application and obtaining of the loan, he dealt only with Hagg and never saw or dealt with any other officer of the bank, in connection with the transaction; that shortly after the loan was made, a majority of the stock of appellant bank was transferred to Stoll, Hagg, and others; and that they were immediately installed as directors of the bank.

There is evidence, in our opinion, to support this finding, and this finding in turn supports the conclusion and judgment of the trial court to the effect that the appellant bank was estopped from claiming that the loan in controversy was made in the regular course of business. 5 Cyc. p. 460.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. EDDARDS. (Cr. 526.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 4, 1914.)

1. False Pretenses (§ 26*)—Information.

An information for obtaining money under false pretenses held sufficient, both in following the language of the statute and in setting forth with particularity the details and successive steps of the fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. Indictment and Information (§ 133*)—Insufficient Amplification—Demurrer.

Objection that the information for obtaining money by false pretenses makes no reference to the means by which the fraud was consummated, aimed at its mere uncertainty because of insufficient amplification to set forth the entire transaction, being in the nature of special demurrer, is waived by failure to demur in limine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 454–468; Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

3. False Pretenses (§ 29*)—Information—Sufficiency.

That one of the representations by which defendant is charged to have obtained money, if standing alone, might not be sufficiently tangible to base a prosecution on does not require a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 34–36; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

4. Criminal Law (§ 829*)—Trial—Instructions.

It is enough that a refused requested instruction was covered by instructions given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 406*)—Evidence—Conversations With Third Person.

Conversations between defendant and another regarding dealings between them, constituting part and proof of the dealings charged between defendant and the complaining witness, are admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 785, 894–917, 920–927; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 371*)—Evidence—Similar Transaction—Motive.

Evidence of a similar transaction of defendant with another is admissible to shed light on his motive in making the representations to complaining witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 830–832; Dec. Dig. § 371.*]

7. Criminal Law (§ 1169*)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Immaterial Evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William S. Wells, Judge.

E. J. Eddards was convicted, denied a new trial, and appeals. Affirmed.

Miss Marguerite Ogden, of San Francisco, and Holcomb & Kempley, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a verdict and judgment of conviction, whereby the defendant was found guilty of the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The first alleged error of the trial court consists in the denial of the motion of the defendant in arrest of judgment, and for a dismissal of the action upon the ground that the facts stated in the information did not constitute a public offense.

The information charges that the defendant, together with one George Gilbert—

"devising and intending by unlawful ways and means and by false and fraudulent pretenses and representations to obtain and get into their custody and possession the personal property of Frank M. Ferguson, with intent to cheat and defraud said Frank M. Ferguson of the same, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly, falsely, fraudulently, and feloniously pretend and represent to the said Frank M. Ferguson that they, the said E. J. Eddards and George Gilbert, had sold to the Standard Oil Company, a corporation, a mica mine for a large sum of money, and that said large sum of money was then and there in the hands of and in the possession of one Asa V. Mendenhall, and that a portion of said large sum of money, to wit, the sum of $15,000, in lawful money of the United States, in the hands and in the possession of said Asa V. Mendenhall, was to be paid by said Asa V. Mendenhall to one J. S. Lord; that said $15,000 in lawful money of the United States was the share and interest of said J. S. Lord received from the sale of said mica mine to the Standard Oil Company, a corporation; that adjoining said mica mine there were other lands containing mica, and that they, the said E. J. Eddards and George Gilbert, had then and there a contract with said Asa V. Mendenhall whereby the said Asa V. Mendenhall would, for a consideration of 10 per cent. of the sale price, induce the Standard Oil Company, a corporation, to purchase from them, the said E. J. Eddards and Geo. Gilbert, 10 mica claims for the sum of $550,000 in lawful money of the United States when they, the said E. J. Eddards and Geo. Gilbert, would locate and properly stake off said ten mica claims and obtain deeds on said mica claims."

It is then set forth specifically that each and all of the foregoing representations were utterly false and fraudulent, and were known so to be by the said E. J. Eddards and Geo. Gilbert, and each of them, and were made by them and each of them for the purpose of inducing said Frank M. Ferguson to pay over and deliver to them the sum of $200; and that the said Frank M. Ferguson, believing each and all of said false and fraudulent representations and pretenses to be true, and being deceived thereby, did deliver and pay over to said defendants the sum of $200, which said sum was received and obtained by them and each of them with the intent then and there to cheat and defraud the said Frank M. Ferguson out of the same, and that they and each of them did thereby then and there willfully, unlawfully, fraudulently, designedly, and feloniously cheat and defraud said Frank M. Ferguson out of said money.

We think this information sufficient both in the respect that it follows the language of the statute, and also in that it sets forth with particularity the details and successive steps of the fraud. It is contended by the defendant that there is no reference in the information as to the means by which the alleged fraud was consummated. This objection, however, is one which is aimed at the mere uncertainty of the information by reason of its insufficient amplification so as to set forth the entire transaction between the defendants and the defrauded person, and is in the nature of a special demurrer. This being so, it should have been made in the form of a demurrer to the information in limine, but the record shows that no such pleading was presented. We think, therefore, that this objection, if otherwise tenable, was waived by the failure of the defendants to demur to the information.

[3] The next contention of the appellant is that one of the several representations made by the defendants to the defrauded person was inadequate to form the basis of a criminal pretense sufficient to satisfy the statute. But this was only one of the representations averred to have been made by the defendant; and, while standing alone, it might not be regarded as sufficiently tangible to base a prosecution upon, still we think that, read with the others, especially when viewed in the light of the entire testimony, the insufficiency of this single item of the charge would not be adequate to work a reversal of the case.

[4] The appellant's next contention is that the court erred in its refusal to give to the jury the fifth instruction asked by his counsel. We think that this instruction, however correct in point of law, was sufficiently covered by the other instructions given by the court.

[5-7] As to the alleged errors of law arising out of the rulings of the court during the trial, we do not find that any of these are of sufficient importance to warrant discussion in detail. The principal one of these has reference to the action of the court in permitting the witness Mendenhall to testify in respect to conversations between himself and the appellant regarding dealings between them closely allied to the transaction with the complaining witness. These conversations were admitted for two reasons: First, as part and proof of the very dealings between the appellant and Ferguson set forth in the information; and, second, as evidence of a similar transaction with Mendenhall tending to shed light upon the motive of the appellant in the making of his representations to Ferguson. Both of these were sufficient reasons for the admission of this testimony. There is also a ruling of the court admitting in evidence a certain telegram for money sent by George Gilbert, the codefendant, with appellant, to the wife of one J. O. Brown, who was one of the associates of appellant in the mica enterprise. The purpose of producing this telegram and its admission does not seem very clear; but it is too immaterial an episode in the progress of the case to justify a reversal, even if it were conceded to be an error.

[8] The main argument of counsel for the appellant upon the hearing of this appeal and in her briefs was devoted to the plea that the evidence in the cause did not sufficiently show the defendant to be guilty of the offense charged in the information. This branch of the case was very clearly, logically, and plausibly presented; and were this the trial court, or were we sitting in the attitude of jurors, we may not say how far it would have availed to set this defendant free; but since the evidence in the cause was conflicting upon practically every important issue of fact involved in the trial, we may not, under the well-established rule of this court, give ear to an argument predicated upon such substantial conflict in the testimony as the record discloses here.

We find no sufficient error of law in the record to justify a reversal of the case. The judgment and order are affirmed.

1. Guardian and Ward (§ 10*)—Right of Parent to Guardianship—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1751, the father or mother of a child under 14 is entitled to be guardian unless the parent is incompetent, even though the child's health and welfare may be promoted by giving it to another.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Application for the appointment of a guardian of Gerald Mathews, a minor. From an order appointing Warren A. Rouse guardian, the mother of the minor appeals. Order reversed.

J. L. Nagle and Louis H. Ward, both of San Francisco, for appellant. E. E. Parlin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by the mother of Gerald Mathews, a minor, from an order appointing one Warren A. Rouse guardian of his person and estate. The minor was born January 28, 1906, and has been in the family of Warren A. Rouse and his wife, Carrie E. Rouse, for over seven years. It is not questioned that the Rouses are in all respects competent to properly care for him, or that he is being given a comfortable home with them and being raised as one of their own children. The application of Rouse for appointment alleged that the father of said minor is either dead or has abandoned the child, and that the mother is an unfit and improper person to have his custody. The trial court found that the father of the minor is dead, and that the mother "is an unfit, incompetent, and improper person to have the care, custody, or control of the said Gerald Mathews," and "that the interest, welfare, and safety and happiness of said minor * * * will be promoted by" the appointment of Rouse.

[1] It is well settled that, under the provisions of section 1751 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the father or mother of a minor child under the age of 14 years, if found by the court competent to discharge the duties of guardianship, is entitled to be appointed guardian in preference to any other person, and that the court must appoint a parent seeking to be appointed, unless it finds such parent incompetent, notwithstanding the judge is of the opinion that the child's health and welfare may be promoted by giving it to another. In re Forrester, 162 Cal. 493, 123 Pac. 283; In re Salter, 142 Cal. 412, 415, 76 Pac. 51. Here, as we have seen, there is such a finding, and the only question is whether such finding has sufficient legal support in the evidence.

[2] We have given the evidence in this case very careful consideration and are unable to find therein sufficient support for this finding. Apparently the mother has always discharged her full duty to her child, in so far as she was able to do so. When he was but a few months old, immediately after the earthquake and fire of 1906, she advertised for a home for him, and in response to an answer to her advertisement she placed the infant in the care of the Rouses, as she says, upon an agreement that she was to pay for its maintenance $25 per month. Her testimony as to an agreement to pay them is opposed to the testimony of Mrs. Rouse, but it is not denied that she constantly, up to a short time ago when she sought the return of the child, contributed substantially to its support, giving the money therefor to Mrs. Rouse. She visited the child at frequent intervals, and so far as we can see failed in no respect in the discharge of any of her obligations as a mother, in so far as she was able to discharge those obligations. She had no property and no home, and worked for a living as a domestic servant, and therefore was obliged to temporarily, at least, place the child somewhere else. It may be that she will still be unable to keep the child with her, but no sufficient reason appears in the evidence why she should be deprived of the legal custody of the child and the right to determine where he shall be kept. She testified that she wishes to place him with her brothers and sisters in their home in San Francisco, and that they have indicated their willingness to receive him. It does not appear that this would be in any way an improper place for the child, or that the child would not be properly cared for in such place. The evidence relied on as warranting a finding of incompetency is pitifully weak, and entirely insufficient in our judgment to warrant a conclusion that the mother is incompetent to act as guardian and should be deprived of the custody of her child.

The order appealed from is reversed.

In re WARNER'S ESTATE.

WARNER v. WARNER. (Sac. 2142.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1914. Rehearing Denied Jan. 11, 1915.)

1. Husband and Wife (§ 33*)—Antenuptial Contract — Breach — Rescission — Estoppel.

An antenuptial contract, by which, in consideration of an annual payment of $100 and the support of her minor daughter, the wife released all her interest in his property except the sum of $1,000, which she was to receive at his death. The marriage took place May 2, 1889, and the wife's daughter became of age July, 1895, about which time she married and left home. The wife continued to accept payments under the contract until the parties became estranged some seven years thereafter, when there was litigation between them concerning her right to file a homestead claim on certain of his land. Held, that the husband's breach of the antenuptial contract by failing to support and care for the wife's daughter became complete in 1895, when the daughter became of age, and, the wife not having elected to rescind the antenuptial contract for that reason during the remainder of her husband's life, she was estopped after his death to repudiate the same in order to claim a widow's share of her husband's estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 196–202, 204, 885; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

2. Contracts (§ 270*)—Rescission—Right to Rescind—Time.

Rescission of a contract, when not effected by consent, can be accomplished only by reasonable diligence to rescind promptly on discovery of the facts giving the right so to do if the party entitled is free from undue influence and aware of his right, and if under such circumstances he does not elect to rescind within a reasonable time, but continues with knowledge of the facts to accept payments due under the contract, the right is barred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1189, 1200; Dec. Dig. § 270.*]

3. Trial (§ 397*)—General Finding—Evidence—Failure to Make Special Finding.

Where, on an issue of estoppel against a widow to claim breach of an antenuptial contract by her husband since deceased, the court made a general finding that she was estopped, which was sustained by the evidence, omission to specifically find that her failure to exercise her right to rescind during the husband's lifetime was not caused by his undue influence was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 940–945; Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

4. Husband and Wife (§ 34*)—Antenuptial Contract—Breach by Husband—Estoppel of Wife—Findings—Evidence.

On an issue as to a widow's right to administer her deceased husband's estate, evidence held to warrant a finding that her failure to exercise her right to rescind an antenuptial contract between them during her husband's life was not caused by his undue influence, and that she was therefore estopped to deny that she was bound thereby because of his alleged breach of the contract which was complete 11 years prior to his death.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Adam Warner, deceased. Applications by Katie Warner and by Adam J. Warner for letters of administration. From an order directing the issuance of letters to Adam J. Warner and denying the motion of Katie Warner for a new trial, she appeals. Affirmed.

A. A. De Ligne and R. Platnauer, both of Sacramento, for appellant. A. L. Shinn and W. F. Renfro, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing in bank was ordered in this cause after a decision in department 1 of this court. Upon further consideration of the case we are satisfied with the reasoning and conclusions reached in the opinion in department, adopt that opinion as the opinion of the court in bank, and affirm the orders appealed from.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The opinion in department, written by Justice SHAW and concurred in by his associates in department, Justices ANGELLOTTI and SLOSS, is as follows:

"In this matter, the appellant, Katie Warner, the widow of deceased, applied for letters of administration of his estate. The respondent, Adam J. Warner, a son of the deceased, filed a counter petition asking that letters be issued to himself. He also filed a written opposition to the widow's petition. The widow, in turn, contested his petition. After a trial of the issues thus presented, the court found in favor of the son and made an order directing that letters of administration issue to him. From this order and from a subsequent order denying her motion for a new trial, the widow appeals.

"There have been two previous appeals in the case. The son, in his written opposition, set up as a bar to the widow's right to letters an antenuptial agreement between her and the deceased, whereby she relinquished all right, claim, and interest in his estate, as heir or otherwise. In her answer thereto she alleged: (1) That the agreement was obtained by fraud; (2) that it was the result of a mutual mistake; (3) that it was without adequate consideration; (4) that Adam Warner in his lifetime waived the agreement; (5) that he had in his lifetime failed to perform it. A general demurrer to this answer was sustained, and letters were awarded to the son. She appealed, and the order was thereupon reversed by the District Court of Appeal, to which the appeal had been duly transferred. That court held that the agreement, on its face, barred her right to letters of administration, that the answer thereto was sufficient upon a general demurrer, and that the court, in that proceeding, had jurisdiction to inquire into the facts upon which she sought to impeach the agreement. See 6 Cal. App. 361. Upon the second hearing in the superior court, findings were made against her upon all the issues and letters were again awarded to the son. Again the widow appealed to the Supreme Court, and again the order was reversed. This reversal was placed on the ground that there was no evidence to support the finding that Adam Warner had performed the conditions of the contract on his part. In his petition and in his written opposition, the son had alleged such performance. Upon the first appeal this allegation was held to present a material issue. Upon the second appeal this statement upon the first appeal was held to have become the law of the case. 158 Cal. 441, 111 Pac. 352. It was further decided that the finding upon the issue as to performance was not sustained by evidence tending to show that the widow had waived performance by consenting to the nonperformance at or before the time of its occurrence. There was no finding that there had been such waiver.

"The antenuptial agreement provided that Adam Warner should take care of, keep, maintain, support, and educate the minor child of the widow, a daughter named Mary, then about 12 years old. It is claimed that Adam Warner failed to perform this covenant, in so far as it bound him to maintain and educate Mary during her minority. The son, after the last appeal, amended his pleadings by alleging a waiver of performance in this respect, and further by alleging that the widow was estopped to claim such failure of performance as a ground for the impeachment of the contract.

"In addition to the covenant to support her and to support and educate the child, the agreement provided that the said Adam Warner should pay the said Katie Warner 'the sum of one hundred dollars per annum out of his own property' and that at his death she should receive $1,000 from his estate. It was held upon the first appeal that this right to receive $1,000 was a mere claim and did not give her an interest in the estate sufficient to entitle her to administration as widow or heir. The antenuptial agreement was executed on May 17, 1889. The marriage took place on the same day. Mary Winkelman, the daughter, became of age on July 9, 1895, and about that time she was married to L. H. Slater.

"The court below found that the widow did not refuse to allow Adam Warner to perform the covenant for the minor child's support and education or prevent such performance by sending her away from home and that she did not by reason thereof prevent or waive such performance. It based its decision giving letters to the son solely upon the ground that the widow was estopped to take advantage of the nonperformance to defeat the agreement. Upon this point the finding is as follows:

" 'That said Katie Warner is estopped to claim that the said agreement was not in full force and effect at the time of the death of said Adam Warner, and is estopped from claiming that the covenants relating to the care, maintenance, support, and education of said minor child were not fully performed by said Adam Warner. That said estoppel arises out of the following facts: That said Adam Warner failed to perform said covenant relative to the care, maintenance, support, and education of said minor child immediately after the marriage of said Adam Warner and Katie Warner, and at all times subsequent; that said minor child became of lawful age and was married more than ten years before the death of said Adam Warner and, at all times after the marriage of said Adam Warner and said Katie Warner, and up to the time of the death of said Adam Warner, said Katie Warner, with full knowledge of the default of said Adam Warner in the performance of said covenants, continued to receive and accept from said Adam Warner the annual payment of $100 therein provided, and, at all times, the said Katie Warner and the said Adam Warner treated the said agreement as being in full force and effect, and each performed all of the covenants of said agreement, except that the said Adam Warner failed to perform the covenants relative to the care, maintenance, support and education of said minor child.'

[1, 2] "It is not claimed that the specific facts set forth in this finding are contrary to the evidence. The appellant insists that they are insufficient, if true, to create an estoppel. This claim we think is wholly untenable. Adam Warner died on January 22, 1906. His breach of the contract became complete in July, 1895, at which time Mary, the minor child, became of age and was married. The right which the widow now claims, as against the validity of the agreement, is the right to repudiate or rescind it because of this breach and thus to avoid its results upon her. This right to rescind accrued to her, if at all, immediately upon the breach becoming complete in 1895. If she then desired to avail herself of it by repudiating the contract and to claim immunity from its effect to deprive her of any share of the decedent's estate as heir or otherwise, it was incumbent upon her to act promptly in the matter and to refuse further recognition of the contract. Rescission, when not effected by consent, can be accomplished only by the use of reasonable diligence to rescind promptly upon discovery of the facts which entitle the party to rescind, if such party is free from undue influence, and is aware of the right to rescind. Code Civ. Proc. § 1691. Where one has a right to rescind a contract because of a breach by the other party, and, with knowledge of such right, continues thereafter to accept from the other party payments due thereunder, the right of such person to rescind the contract for that breach is thereby barred. Delano v. Jacoby, 96 Cal. 280, 31 Pac. 290, 31 Am. St. Rep. 201; Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 320, 75 Pac. 899; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 817, 897, 917. The effect of such conduct is sometimes called a waiver of the right to rescind, and sometimes it is said that it creates an estoppel against that right. The mere name given to the effect of the conduct is immaterial. Upon the breach of the covenant she had her option either to treat the contract as subsisting and to rely upon her right to recover damages for that breach, or to rescind it altogether and thereafter to refuse to recognize it or act under it and thenceforth to claim a restoration to her prospective rights in his estate at his death as his widow. Her conduct in subsequently receiving and accepting these payments up to the time of his death clearly evinces an intention not to rescind the contract but to insist upon its validity. After having so acted for the ten years succeeding the breach and having thereby induced him to continue making the payments of $100 each year as the contract provided, she cannot now assert her former right to rescind.

[3, 4] "It is suggested that the court does not expressly find that her failure to exercise her right to rescind was not caused by the undue influence of her husband, and hence that the presumption that she was under such influence must prevail, and that this excuses her failure to exercise her right. We are of the opinion that this point is covered by the general finding that she is estopped to claim that the agreement is now not fully performed by reason of the specific facts stated. If she had been prevented from earlier rescission by his undue influence, then she would not have been estopped. The finding therefore implies that she was not so prevented. Thus construing the finding, it is fully sustained on this point by the evidence. The parties were estranged during the last seven years of his life, and in the year 1900 there was sharp litigation between them concerning the effect of this agreement upon her right to file a declaration of homestead upon his land. He brought an action to cancel the homestead declaration on the ground that it was filed without his consent and that the antenuptial agreement prevented her from claiming a homestead interest in his property. In that litigation she had the advice of her own attorney in regard to the agreement and its legal effect. This occurred several years after the complete breach of the covenant and six years before his death, during all of which time she continued to receive the payments.

"There is no merit in the claim that this question of estoppel was decided against the son by this court on the last appeal and has now become the law of the case. The court there, in reversing the order on the ground that there was no evidence to sustain the finding on the material issue of nonperformance, said that this omission was not cured by the fact that evidence had been introduced tending to show that the widow had waived the nonperformance by consenting thereto at or before the time of the breach. On the issue of waiver there was no finding. No other reference was made to the subject of waiver or estoppel. The fact that she accepted annual payments after the breach occurred is not even mentioned, nor is anything said about the effect of such acceptance. No rule of law was announced in that opinion which could become the law of the case on the facts presented upon the present appeal on the subject of estoppel or waiver.

"These comprise all the questions presented in support of the appeal. We find no ground upon which the order complained of can be deemed erroneous."

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

3. Commerce (§ 69*)—Corporations—Privileges—Excise Taxes.

The taxes imposed by Pol. Code, § 409, requiring the Secretary of State to charge and collect fees for filing articles of incorporation, graduated on the amount of the capital stock, and by St. 1905, p. 493, imposing an annual license tax on foreign corporations doing business in the state, are excise taxes, demanded as a privilege for the right to do a domestic business, and not taxes based on the capital stock but merely measured thereby, and the imposition of the taxes on a foreign corporation selling its merchandise in the state, though manufactured elsewhere, is not an interference with interstate commerce.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Petition for mandate by Albert Pick & Co. against Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State, to direct the filing of a certified copy of articles of incorporation, without payment of fees. From a judgment awarding the mandate prayed for, Frank C. Jordan, appeals. Reversed with directions.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Raymond Benjamin, Chief Deputy Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellant. McClellan & McClellan, J. C. Campbell, and David L. Levy, all of San Francisco, for respondent. Campbell, Weaver, Sheldon & Levy, of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner is a corporation, organized under the laws of the state of Illinois, for the purpose of manufacturing and selling and generally dealing in china, glassware, pottery, restaurant supplies, and other merchandise. It manufactures none of the enumerated articles in the state of California. However, as it avers in its petition, it has for a long time been engaged in interstate commerce in these goods and wares between the state of Illinois, the state of California, and other states of the United States.

It maintains a branch office and place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, and sells its goods, wares, and merchandise in the city and county of San Francisco and in other states of the United States, and ships its goods, wares, and merchandise from the state of Illinois into the state of California and into other states, and from the state of California into other states. It has tendered to the secretary of state for filing a certified copy of its articles of incorporation with other appropriate papers required by the laws of the state, and the secretary of state has refused to file the same excepting upon prepayment of the fee fixed by section 416 of the Political Code (now 409, Pol. Code), and the fee prescribed by section 2 of the act relating to revenue and taxation providing for a license tax on corporations. Stats. 1905, p. 493. Petitioner, refusing to pay the fees, made application to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for mandate against the secretary of state directing him to file these papers without payment of the fee exacted by the terms of subdivision 4 of section 409 above cited and the corporation license tax of 1905.

The secretary of state answered, setting forth that the petitioner, besides the conduct of interstate commerce in which it is admittedly engaged, transacts—

> "a large volume of intrastate business within the state of California; that said intrastate business forms no part of and is neither inextricably nor necessarily connected with the interstate business of said company; and respondent further alleges that its said interstate business is nowise dependent upon the aforesaid intrastate business of said company; that the authorized capital stock of said company amounts to one million dollars."

A general demurrer to this answer was interposed and sustained, and the trial court filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein it declared in accordance with the allegations of the petition and awarded the mandate prayed for. The secretary of state has appealed from this judgment.

[1] Upon this appeal we are asked to distinguish this case from that of Mulford Co. v. Curry, 163 Cal. 276, 125 Pac. 236, where this court, in the matter of the exaction of taxes or fees upon corporations engaged in interstate commerce, sought (though perhaps in vain) to determine the underlying principles and to follow the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States enunciated in that series of cases beginning with Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 1, 30 Sup. Ct. 190, 54 L. Ed. 355. We are asked to do this because of the new light which it is said has been shed upon the legal questions involved by the cases of Baltic Mining Co. and S. S. White Dental Manufacturing Co. v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and reported in 231 U. S. 68, 34 Sup. Ct. 15, 58 L. Ed. 127.

In Mulford Co. v. Curry this court expressed the reluctance it felt over the necessity of applying the principles of the Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas, and the other like cases to the fiscal and revenue laws of the state. It did so under the compulsion of its oath to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States as expounded by its highest tribunal. If we were in error in our understanding of the law, if the Supreme Court of the United States has latterly thrown additional light upon its own exposition of the law, or if it has receded from any of the views which it has expressed in the earlier cases, it is for this court to remodel its own decisions in swift conformity therewith.

It becomes necessary, therefore, even at the peril of prolixity, to set forth the understanding which this court had, and which in Mulford Co. v. Curry it expressed, of the legal principles enunciated and the legal controversies decided in that series of cases beginning with the Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas.

By the law of Kansas every foreign corporation "seeking to do business in this state" was required to file a copy of its charter or of its articles of incorporation with the secretary of state, and, when so filing, to "pay to the state treasurer of Kansas, for the benefit of the permanent school fund, a charter fee of one-tenth of one per cent. of its authorized capital upon the first $100,000 of its capital stock or any part thereof, and upon the next $400,000 or any part thereof of one-twentieth of one per cent.; and for each million or major part thereof over and above the sum of $500,000, $200." The Western Union Telegraph Company, a New York corporation, was conducting business in the state of Kansas. That business was both interstate, involving the reception within the state of messages from points outside of the state, and, conversely, the sending of messages from points within the state to points outside the state, and intrastate or domestic, consisting of the sending and reception of messages between different points wholly within the state. It refused to make the filing and pay the fee prescribed by the Kansas statute, and the state brought its action in one of its own courts against the company, seeking to oust and restrain it from doing any domestic business within the state, such being one of the penalties by the laws of Kansas prescribed. The state court rendered its decree of ouster and restraint as prayed for. The cause was transferred under writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there decided by a sharply divided court upon an elaborate opinion handed down by Mr Justice Harlan. The Western Union Telegraph Company was capitalized for $100,000,000. The "charter fee" (such is the description of the fee used by the state of Kansas) in the case of the Western Union Telegraph Company amounted to $20,100.

Amongst the contentions of the state of Kansas in support of the validity of the judgment of its court were that it had the absolute right to impose the terms and conditions upon which a foreign corporation might do a domestic business within its territorial limits; that the fiscal law under review imposed as such condition the payment of a charter fee based on or admeasured by the par value of the capital stock of corporations; that this was not a tax upon the property of the corporation either within or without the state, but was "a local police regulation on local business only"; that the fact that the statute might cause inconvenience to interstate business did not render it unconstitutional; that the failure to comply with the law did not prevent the foreign corporation from continuing to the fullest extent in engaging in interstate commerce. The contentions of plaintiff in error are set forth by the Supreme Court in the opening paragraph of the opinion which it rendered in that case. They are as follows:

> "The contentions of the company, to which particular attention will be directed, are, in substance, that the requirement that it pay, for the benefit of the permanent school fund of the state, a given per cent. of its authorized capital, wherever and however employed, as a condition of its right to continue to do domestic business in Kansas, is a regulation which, by its necessary operation, directly burdens or embarrasses interstate commerce, and therefore is illegal under the commerce clause of the Constitution; further, that such a requirement involves the taxation not only of the company's interstate business everywhere, but equally the property employed by it beyond the limits of the state, a thing which could not be done consistently with the due process of law enjoined by the fourteenth amendment."

And here, at the outset, it may be well to state that each and every one of these contentions is to the fullest extent sustained by the decision. It is to be remembered that the Supreme Court itself declares that these contentions are the ones to which particular attention will be directed. What the Supreme Court decides is that without regard to the name by which the license, or fee, or excise, or impost, or occupation or privilege tax, may be called, when it takes the form that it took in Kansas, of an exacted payment of a given per cent. of the authorized capital stock, this exaction accomplishes two distinct illegal and unconstitutional results. First, it is in legal effect a tax upon all of the property represented by the capital stock of the corporation, therefore a tax upon such parts of the property as were engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore an invalid tax under the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States; and, second, it is an attempt by the state to tax property beyond its territorial jurisdiction, and is therefore confiscatory in nature and violative of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. That there can be no possibility of misunderstanding the meaning of the Supreme Court in this particular, we shall employ a few quotations from its decisions. But before doing so we will quote one sentence from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes in this particular case. Bearing in mind that the majority of the Supreme Court declared that the Kansas law imposed a tax, we note Justice Holmes in dissenting saying:

> "I assume that a state cannot tax a corporation on commerce carried on by it with another state, or on property outside the jurisdiction of the taxing state; and I assume, further, that for that reason a tax on or measured by the value of the total stock of a corporation like the Western Union Telegraph Company is void."

Mr. Justice Holmes' argument proceeds upon the view that Kansas had not imposed a tax at all.

> "She simply has said to the company that if it wants to do local business it must pay a certain sum of money. * * * The whole matter is left in the Western Union's hands."

The prevailing opinion declared that there was no decision—

> "holding that a state may, by any device, or in any way, whether by a license tax, in the form of a 'fee,' or otherwise, burden the interstate business of a corporation of another state. * * * If the statute, reasonably interpreted, either directly or by its necessary operation, burdens interstate commerce, it must be adjudged to be invalid, whatever may have been the purpose for which it was enacted, and although the company may do both interstate and local business. This court has repeatedly adjudged that in all such matters the judiciary will not regard mere forms, but will look through the forms to the substance of things."

Then says the court:

> "Looking, then, at the natural and reasonable effect of the statute, disregarding mere forms of expression, it is clear that the making of the payment by the telegraph company, as a charter fee, of a given per cent. of its authorized capital, representing, as that capital clearly does, all of its business and property, both within and outside of the state, a condition of its right to do local business in Kansas, is, in its essence, not simply a tax for the privilege of doing local business in the state, but a burden and tax on the company's interstate business and on its property located or used outside of the state. The express words of the statute leave no doubt as to what is the basis on which the fee, specified in the state statute, rests. That fee, plainly, is not based on such of the company's capital stock as is represented in its local business and property in Kansas. The requirement is a given per cent. of the company's authorized capital; that is, all its capital, wherever or however employed, whether in the United States or in foreign countries, and whatever may be the extent of its lines in Kansas as compared with its lines outside of that state. What part of the fee exacted is to be attributed to the company's domestic business in Kansas and what part to interstate business the state has not chosen to ascertain and declare in the statute. It strikes at the company's entire business wherever conducted and its property wherever located, and, in terms, makes it a condition of the telegraph company's right to transact purely local business in Kansas that it shall contribute for the benefit of the state school fund a given per cent. of its whole authorized capital, representing all of its property and all its business and interests everywhere. * * * So, in the case now before us, the exaction, as a condition of the privilege of continuing to do or doing local business in Kansas, that the telegraph company shall pay a given per cent. of its authorized capital stock, is, for every practical purpose, a tax both on the company's local business in Kansas, and on its interstate business or on the privilege of doing interstate business; for the statute, by its necessary operation, will accomplish precisely the result that would have been accomplished had it been made, in express words, a condition of doing local business that the telegraph company should submit to taxation upon both its interstate and intrastate business and upon its interests and property everywhere, as represented by its capital stock. The exaction made by the Kansas statute is as much a tax on the interstate business of the company and on its property outside of the state as a fee or tax on the sale of an article imported only for sale or as a tax on the occupation of an importer would be a tax on the property imported."

In the course of its argument and in demonstration that its reasoning was not meant to apply exclusively to that class of corporations known as common carriers, it uses this illustration:

"If a domestic corporation engaged in the business of soliciting orders for goods manufactured, sold, and delivered in a state, should, in addition, solicit orders for goods manufactured in and to be brought from another state for delivery, could the former state make it a condition of the right to engage in local business within its limits that the corporation pay a given per cent. of all fees or commissions received by it in its business, interstate and domestic? There can be but one answer to this question, namely, that such a condition would operate as a direct burden on interstate commerce, and therefore would be unconstitutional and void. Consistently with the Constitution no court could, by any form of decree, recognize or give effect to or enforce such a condition."

And in announcing the familiar doctrine that Kansas might exact a license tax of the corporation "strictly on account of local business done by it in that state," it couples this statement with the declaration:

"But it is altogether a different thing for Kansas to deny it the privilege of doing such local business, beneficial to the public, except on condition that it shall first pay to the state a given per cent. of all its capital stock, representing all of its property, wherever situated, and all its business in and outside of the state."

And the opinion concludes as follows:

"The right of the Telegraph Company to continue the transaction of local business in Kansas could not be made to depend upon its submission to a condition prescribed by that state which was hostile both to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. The company was not bound, under any circumstances, to surrender its constitutional exemption from state taxation, direct or indirect, in respect of its interstate business and its property outside of the state, any more than it would have been bound to surrender any other right secured by the national Constitution."

The next case of Pullman Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 56, 30 Sup. Ct. 232, 54 L. Ed. 378, arose under the same Kansas statute, Mr. Justice Harlan again delivering the opinion. It reiterates and reaffirms the opinion and decision of the Western Union Case, and defines that decision in terms, and in the following language:

"The Charter Board, we have seen, gave it permission to engage in intrastate business in Kansas on condition that it should pay to the State Treasurer for the benefit of the permanent school fund of the state, as a charter fee, the sum of $14,800, which is the prescribed statutory per cent. of the company's authorized capital, representing all of its property and interests everywhere, in and out of the state, and all its business, both interstate and intrastate. It does not appear how much of the single 'fee' demanded by the state is to be referred to the interstate business of the company nor how much to its property outside of the state, nor what part has reference to its intrastate business or to its property within the state. * * * We hold: * * * (2) That the requirement that the company, as a condition of its right to do intrastate business in Kansas, should, in the form of a fee, pay to the state a specified per cent. of its authorized capital, was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, in that such a single fee, based as it was on all the property, interests, and business of the company, within and out of the state, was, in effect, a tax both on the interstate business of that company, and on its property outside of Kansas, and compelled the company, in order that it might do local business in Kansas in connection with its interstate business, to waive its constitutional exemption from state taxation on its interstate business and on its property outside of the state and contribute from its capital to the support of the public schools of Kansas."

Mr. Justice White filed a concurring opinion in that case, in which, while assenting to the views of his associates, he carried the doctrine further than they, declaring, with unimpeachable logic:

"It is not by me doubted that as a practical question the arbitrary prohibition against doing a local business imposed on one engaged in and having the right to engage in interstate commerce is to burden that business."

Epigrammatically, he presents the controversy in the following sentences:

"The only right here challenged is the authority of a state to impose an unconstitutional tax and validate the tax by making the payment of the unlawful tax a condition of the right to do a local business. And this upon the false assumption that absolute power to exclude exists; that is, to impose an unlawful tax and sustain it by another unlawful assumption of power, a process of reasoning which, to my mind, must rest on the proposition that in deciding questions of constitutional power it is to be held that two wrongs make a right."

Mr. Justice Holmes again dissented, reiterating in amplified form the views expressed in his earlier dissent, and concluding:

"I think that the tax in question, for I am perfectly willing to call it a tax, was lawful under all the decisions of this court until last week." (The italics are ours.)

The next case was Ludwig v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 216 U. S. 146, 30 Sup. Ct. 280, 54 L. Ed. 423. This case had to do with an Arkansas law, which required all foreign corporations to file copies of their charters or articles of incorporation with the secretary of state, under heavy penalties for failure so to do, and required them also to pay into the treasury of the state, "for the filing of said articles, a fee of $25 where the capital stock is $50,000 or under; $75 where the capital stock is over $50,000 and not more than $100,000; and $25 additional for each $100,000 of capital stock." The Supreme Court of the United States declared that the case could not "be distinguished in principle from Western Union v. Kansas and Pullman Co. v. Kansas," and that the difference in the wording of the Kansas and Arkansas statutes—the former being in the nature of a percentage tax, the latter naming fixed sums of money based upon capitalization—did not differentiate the cases so as to take the Arkansas statute out of the ruling of the former cases. These cases were followed by Atchison, etc., Railway Co. v. O'Connor, 223 U. S. 280, 32 Sup. Ct. 216, 56 L. Ed. 436, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1050. The statute of Colorado exacted a "fee" of a foreign corporation of two cents upon each $1,000 of its capital stock, which fee it was declared was for the right to do a local business within the state. The action was brought to recover the tax paid under protest. Mr. Justice Holmes, who dissented in the earlier cases, delivering the opinion of the court, declared:

> "Therefore it is obvious that the tax is of the kind decided by this court to be unconstitutional, since the decision below in the present case, even if the temporary forfeiture of the right to do business declared by the statute be confined by construction, as it seems to have been below, to do business wholly within the state."

Again the question arose in International Text-Book Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S. 91, 30 Sup. Ct. 481, 54 L. Ed. 678, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 493, 18 Ann. Cas. 1103. The International Text-Book Company was a Pennsylvania corporation organized for purposes of profit and with a capital stock. It combined the publication of text-books and courses of instruction in various arts and sciences with an educational school conducted by correspondence, to the students of which it transmitted for a consideration these text-books and educational courses. It employed salaried agents within specified territories to secure pupils or students. It did so in Kansas. It failed or refused to comply with certain provisions of the Kansas statute, one the provision for the charter fee considered in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas, supra, and another the provision requiring it to file with the secretary of state a detailed statement showing the authorized capital, the paid-up capital stock, the amount of assets and liabilities, etc. Among the penalties prescribed for a failure so to do was the denial of the right to the defaulting corporation to maintain an action in any of the courts of the state. The International Text-Book Company sued Pigg as a debtor under one of its contracts of instruction. The Supreme Court of the United States reaffirmed the invalidity of the Kansas charter fee statute, and further declared:

> "It is the established doctrine of this court that a state may not, in any form or under any guise, directly burden the prosecution of interstate business. But such a burden is imposed when the corporation of another state, lawfully engaged in interstate commerce, is required, as a condition of its right to prosecute its business in Kansas, to make and file a statement setting forth certain facts which the state confessedly could not control by legislation. It results that the provision as to the statement mentioned in section 1283 [Gen. St. 1901] must fall before the Constitution of the United States, and with it—according to the established rules of statutory construction—must fall that part of the same section which provides that the obtaining of the certificate of the secretary of state that such statement has been properly made shall be a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to maintain an action in the courts of Kansas."

And, finally, was decided in Bucks Stove & Range Co. v. Vickers, 226 U. S. 205, 33 Sup. Ct. 41, 57 L. Ed. 189, where this purely manufacturing and mercantile corporation offended against the same Kansas law and was held by the Supreme Court to be immune from punishment therefor, under authority of the Pigg Case, supra.

We have now considered all of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States (saving the Massachusetts case hereinafter to be reviewed) which can have any bearing upon the questions before us. It becomes pertinent here to take up for brief analysis the case of Mulford Co. v. Curry, supra, wherein in this state the foregoing decisions of the Supreme Court first came under review. The more pertinent does it become to do this since the statutes in the present case under review are in all substantial particulars identically the same as they were when Mulford Co. v. Curry was decided. A reference to Mulford Co. v. Curry will save a repetition of the language of those statutes. Additionally it should be added that section 410 of our Civil Code declares that every foreign corporation which shall neglect or fail to comply with the conditions of sections 408 and 409 of the Code shall be subject to a fine of not less than $500, to be paid into the state treasury to the credit of the general fund, and every such corporation so failing is denied the right "to maintain any suit or action in any of the courts of this state, or acquire or convey any legal title to any real property within the state until it has complied with said section." This language is as general as language can be made. It is declared applicable to "every corporation organized under the laws of another state, territory, or of a foreign country." Section 408 requires "every corporation organized under the laws of another state, territory, or of a foreign country" to "file in the office of the secretary of state of the state of California a certified copy of its articles of incorporation," etc. The language of section 416 of the Political Code quoted in Mulford Co. v. Curry has become by amendment the language of the present section 409 of the same Code.

The Mulford Company, like the petitioner in the case at bar, was a commercial corporation organized to do, and doing, an interstate business and an intrastate business within the state of California. Like the present petitioner, it objected to the enforcement of the fees exacted by our laws, and, after tendering certain nominal filing fees, sought mandate against the secretary of state to compel him to receive and file certain documents, the filing of which was called for by our laws. That part of our laws to which the Mulford Company in especial objected was section 416 of the Political Code (now 409). This law, it will be noted (as did the Kansas statute), imposes a single fee upon corporations which it is made mandatory upon the Secretary of State to collect for filing their articles of incorporation, the other sections referred to requiring that such articles be filed. In addition to this law, requiring foreign corporations to pay this fee before they can engage in business in the state of California at all, we have upon our books another law designated in its title as "A license tax upon corporations," requiring them to pay an annual license tax for the right to continue in business. Stats. 1905, p. 493. It was the first license law which this court had under especial consideration in the case of Mulford Co. v. Curry. This may be noted from the declaration in the case where the annual license fee law is set out, that it is set out as "having further relation to the matter." It was not important to the decision in the Mulford Company Case to elaborate our views upon these acts separately. The latter one was referred to, first, because it formed a part of the same fiscal system; second, because it, too, based its license fee charges upon the authorized capital stock of corporations; and, third, because the practical effect in the case of every foreign corporation seeking to engage in business in the state of California was to require it to pay two fees. To illustrate, if the Western Union Telegraph Company had undertaken to engage in business in California, an analysis and competition will show that it would have been required to pay a fee of $10,000 under sections 409 of the Civil Code and 416 of the Political Code, and a fee of $250 under the corporation license tax act, or a total of $10,250 in California, as compared with $20,100 in Kansas.

Turning to the judgment in Mulford Co. v. Curry, it will be found that the only judgment rendered is a declaration that the requirement of section 408 of the Civil Code, that the petitioner file its articles of incorporation, is a reasonable requirement, but that the further requirement that, as a condition of such filing, the petitioner pay the fee exacted by section 409 of the Civil Code and 416 of the Political Code is illegal. Neither by the terms of the judgment nor by any express language in the opinion itself was the annual license tax declared to be unconstitutional under the authority of the federal cases. But since the Supreme Court of the United States had declared that such fees, when based upon the total capital stock, were invalid exactions for the reasons given, the fear was felt and expressed that even the annual corporation license tax, so founded upon the capital stock, might fall under the same ban, and this court sought to advise the Legislature as to what it conceived the Supreme Court of the United States had declared to be the limit of the law-making power in the matter.

What, then, did the Supreme Court of the United States decide in its cases?

It decided: (a) That it would review and consider the language of each state fiscal act and determine for itself, regardless of the determination of the states' legislative or judicial departments, what in fact the law did mean and what in fact it did accomplish, quoting with approval from Galveston, Harrisburg, etc., Co. v. Texas, 210 U. S. 217, 28 Sup. Ct. 638, 52 L. Ed. 1031, to the following effect: "Neither the state courts, nor the Legislatures, by giving the tax a particular name, or by the use of some form of words, can take away our duty to consider its nature and effect. (b) If under the interpretation of the Supreme Court it resulted that a particular statute "either directly or by its necessary operation burdens interstate commerce, it must be adjudged to be invalid, whatever may have been the purpose for which it was enacted, and although the company may do both interstate and local business." (c) It decided that interstate commerce was illegally burdened by a tax or fee directly on or based on the capital stock of a corporation which, though engaged in local business within a state, was also engaged in interstate commerce. Thus we find the court in Pullman Co. v. Kansas saying that "the requirement that the company, as a condition of its right to do intrastate business in Kansas, should, in the form of a fee, pay to the state a specified per cent. of its authorized capital, was a violation of the Constitution of the United States, in that such a single fee, based as it was on all the property interests and business of the company, within and out the state, was, in effect, a tax both on the interstate business of that company, and on its property outside of Kansas." Again, we find Mr. Justice Holmes in his dissenting opinion "assuming" and conceding that "a tax on or measured by the value of the total stock of a corporation like the Western Union Telegraph Company is void." And again we have him declaring in his dissenting opinion in the Pullman Case: "I think that the tax in question, for I am perfectly willing to call it a tax, was lawful." (d) We find that the unconstitutionality and illegality of the tax so based and levied are declared to exist upon two separate and wholly distinct grounds, which grounds are enunciated and re-enunciated time and again. Those grounds may be thus stated: The requirement to pay a given per cent. of the capital stock as a prerequisite of the right to do a local business exacts burdensome and unconstitutional conditions from the corporation; the first that the state thus taxes the instrumentalities and properties used in interstate commerce which lie without the taxing power of the state, and thus unduly burdens interstate commerce in violation of the commerce clause of the Constitution; and the second that such an act in taxing property without the jurisdiction of the taxing power requires a corporation seeking to do local business within a state to waive its constitutional right of exemption from taxation on its property lying outside of the state. (e) These results are declared to follow from the act of taxing the whole capital stock of such a corporation and are nowhere and nowise declared to be dependent either upon the amount of the capitalization of the corporation nor upon the amount of the tax exacted from that corporation. We perceived, or thought we perceived, the ground for this in the principle that if the power to tax in a given way be conceded, the amount of the tax is vested wholly in the discretion of the taxing power, and we had in mind not only the language of Chief Justice Marshall "that the power to tax involves the power to destroy" (McCullouch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. Ed. 579), but also the language of Brennan v. Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 14 Sup. Ct. 829, 38 L. Ed. 719, quoted with approval in the Western Union Case, in reference to such license taxes, that "if a state may lawfully exact it, it may increase the amount of the exaction until all interstate commerce in this mode ceases to be possible." (f) That, in thus guarding interstate commerce from unlawful interference, the Supreme Court would be governed not by what a given charge was or was called, but by consideration of what in its operation was its effect upon such commerce. For we find in the Western Union Telegraph Case the following language quoted with approval from Ashley v. Ryan, 153 U. S. 436, 14 Sup. Ct. 865, 38 L. Ed. 773:

> "Whether this charge be viewed as a tax, a license, or a fee, if its exaction violated the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, or involved the assertion of the right of a state to exercise its powers of taxation beyond its geographical limits, it was void, whatever might be the technical character affixed to the exaction."

(g) We believed that the Supreme Court meant and declared, for the indicated reasons, that the method of charging a fee upon foreign corporations for the right to do a local business on or based on the capital stock of such corporations was forever inhibited, the Supreme Court saying:

> "There are sufficient modes in which the internal business, if not already taxed in some other way, may be subjected to taxation, without the imposition of a tax which covers the entire operations of the company." Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 8 Sup. Ct. 1383, 32 L. Ed. 311.

And to the declaration of Mr. Justice Holmes in his dissenting opinion to the following effect: "If, after this decision, the state of Kansas, without giving any reason sees fit simply to prohibit the Western Union Telegraph Company from doing any more local business there, or from doing local business until it has paid $20,100, I shall be curious to see upon what ground that legislation will be assailed,"—we believed that the answer would be, as above indicated, that it was not the amount of the charge which determined the invalidity, but the fact that the charge was laid upon property without the taxing power of the state, and that to submit to the payment of it in such a form (that is, a tax on all the capital stock) would be to force the surrender upon the part of the corporations of their well-defined constitutional rights.

These, then, were some of the conclusions which we drew from the decisions of the Supreme Court, and which, with more or less completeness, we sought to declare in Mulford Co. v. Curry. One part of the judgment of the Supreme Court we conceived to be apodictic, and that was that all the capital stock of such a corporation could not be subjected to any tax without doing violence to the Constitution of the United States, and it was under this conviction that we sought in Mulford Co. v. Curry to enlighten our legislative department as to the danger which would attach to all laws basing license fees of a foreign corporation on this method of taxation.

There arose in Massachusetts two cases of similar import, Baltic Mining Co., 207 Mass. 381, 93 N. E. 831, and the S. S. White Dental Manufacturing Co. v. Commonwealth, 212 Mass. 35, 98 N. E. 1056, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 805. For convenience we may refer to but one and call that the Dental Company Case. The Dental Manufacturing Company was a Pennsylvania corporation, having no factories in Massachusetts, but engaged in domestic business within the state of Massachusetts, as well as in interstate commerce. The Massachusetts revenue laws provided that:

> "Every foreign corporation shall, in each year, at the time of filing its annual certificate of condition, pay to the treasurer and receiver general, for the use of the commonwealth, an excise tax to be assessed by the tax commissioner, of one-fiftieth of one per cent. of the par value of its authorized capital stock as stated in its annual certificate of condition; but the amount of such excise tax shall not in any one year exceed the sum of $2,000."

The Dental Manufacturing Company objected to the payment of the tax upon the three grounds so clearly enunciated in Western Union Telegraph Company v. Kansas. Those grounds, as stated by the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the case subsequently went on writ of error, being:

> "First, the tax is a regulation of interstate commerce, in that it imposes a direct burden upon that portion of the business and capital of the plaintiffs in error which is devoted to interstate commerce; second, the tax is in violation of the due process of law clause, because it attempts to impose taxes upon property beyond the jurisdiction of the commonwealth of Massachusetts; and, third, the tax denies to the plaintiffs in error the equal protection of the law."

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, after a painstaking review of its taxation history, its peculiar system of taxation and the decisions of its courts, held the tax to be a pure excise tax, "excise tax" as thus employed meaning a privilege tax upon the right to pursue an occupation, and not a tax upon property at all. It declared that it recognized that the Supreme Court of the United States would look through the form to the substance, and determine for itself whether such an impost was or was not a property tax or a burden upon interstate commerce, and to this point cited the decisions of the Supreme Court which we have been considering. But it declared that there were "at least two important and, as we think, vital distinctions between these cases and the one at bar." The first of those distinctions is declared to be the fact that in the cases before the Supreme Court of the United States the corporations, though one and all engaged in domestic commerce, were common carriers, organized for the transportation of intelligence, commerce, and persons between the states, and that their local business could not be given up without impairing their capacity to transact their interstate business. And the second distinction was that the maximum fee allowed by the Massachusetts statute was $2,000, while in the Kansas and Arkansas statutes the tax was graded and increased by the amount of the capital stock, and to the mind of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts "this provision demonstrates that it is not a property tax, but only an excise, so limited that it cannot reach beyond a reasonable license fee." Further, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts points out that a flat rate of $2,000 might have been exacted of all corporations without doing violence to any right guarantied by the Constitution of the United States, and that in fact what Massachusetts has done has been to diminish the burden upon corporations of smaller capitalization. Again, the Massachusetts court points out, as a compelling reason for its determination, that the authorized capital stock of the Dental Company is $1,000,000, while its assets aggregate $5,711,718.29, thus to its mind evidencing the fact that the tax was an excise and not a property tax on or based on its authorized capital stock. And, lastly, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts decided that the act did not apply to common carriers, railroad, telegraph, and telephone, which were taxed upon another plan; that it did not apply to corporations whose sole business within the state was interstate commerce, nor yet to corporations carrying on both interstate and domestic commerce, whose domestic or intrastate business was conducted in such close connection with the other that it could not be abandoned without serious impairment of the interstate business. It held that the Dental Company's intrastate business was severably distinct from its interstate business, and that therefore it was liable to the payment of this excise tax for the privilege of carrying on that intrastate business.

These cases (Baltic Mining Co. and S. S. White Dental Mfg. Co. v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 231 U. S. 68, 34 Sup. Ct. 15, 58 L. Ed. 127), as has been said, went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in an opinion handed down by Mr. Justice Day, the judgment of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, upholding the validity of its foreign corporation license tax law and the liability of the Dental Company to pay this tax, was sustained, Chief Justice White, Mr. Justice Van Devanter, and Mr. Justice Pitney dissenting. The ground of their dissent has not been stated, but we think it beyond peradventure that, looking through form to substance, they believed this Massachusetts tax, call it excise or what you will, was in fact a tax upon the total capital stock of the dental corporation, and thus was a tax within the inhibition declared in the Western Union Telegraph Company v. Kansas and the other like cases.

[2] The Supreme Court of the United States adopts without reservation the determination of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts that this fee was an excise tax as distinguished from a property tax. It may at once be granted that it is that form of an excise tax which is frequently denominated a privilege or occupation tax, but it by no means follows that, being an excise tax, this is conclusive that it is not levied upon property. Indeed, many forms of excise tax are distinctly and admittedly levied upon property, and every definition of excise includes this kind of tax. An excise is "an inland impost levied upon articles of manufacture or sale, and also upon licenses to pursue certain trades, or to deal in certain commodities." Patton v. Brady, 184 U. S. 617, 22 Sup. Ct. 496, 46 L. Ed. 713. To say that because a tax is an excise it is not levied upon property is to throw all the reasoning of the Supreme Court in all these cases to the four winds. The argument was made in these cases, and it was a sound argument, that the laws under consideration merely imposed an occupation or privilege tax—in short an excise tax—for the right to do a local business, and this was conceded by all of the justices of the Supreme Court. Their answer, however, to the conclusion sought to be drawn from this was that, notwithstanding that it is an excise tax or privilege or occupation tax, it is levied upon property beyond the taxing power of the state, and by the fact that it is so levied imposes a burden upon property without the state which is engaged in interstate commerce. We are unable to perceive, therefore, how the determination that the Massachusetts tax is an excise tax relieves it from the condemnation imposed upon the Kansas statute for attempting to do the same thing by fixing or basing its tax on the total capital stock of the corporation. As little do we perceive that the amount of the tax imposed by the Massachusetts law has materiality in the consideration. If the principle upon which its tax is based is a sound one, it may to-morrow increase the amount of the tax to any extent. It is true that in the earlier cases the corporations involved were common carriers, and the Supreme Court of the United States makes mention of that fact in the Dental Case, but it does not say that this consideration influenced or was determinative of the controversy. To the contrary, it does say that all corporations engaged in interstate commerce are under the equal protection of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and, indeed, no distinction between them can justly be drawn. If it is important that common carriers—the instrumentalities by and through which commerce is conveyed—shall be protected from unwarranted burdens, it is equally necessary that the owners of the commerce to be conveyed should receive a like protection. While interstate commerce would unquestionably be vitally impaired if common carriers were eliminated, interstate commerce would be totally destroyed if the goods, wares, and merchandise embraced within the meaning of the word were debarred from interstate and foreign transportation. The Supreme Court of the United States points out very truly that in the Western Union Telegraph Company Case and in the Pullman Case "there was no attempt to separate the intrastate business from the interstate business." No such attempt is made by the Massachusetts law. True, the Massachusetts Supreme Court, under a stipulation of facts, finds that about 5 per cent. of the business of the Dental Company was intrastate. But there is no attempt in the law to impose any tax upon that part of its business nor upon the $100,000 worth of property which represents the company's holdings in the state. It would have been just as easy and as practical to have shown in the Western Union Telegraph Company Case the proportion of its local business as compared with its interstate business, and, indeed, in the case of every common carrier or commercial concern, we venture the assertion that not the slightest practical difficulty will be found in so doing. Indeed, we may recall the fact that this is required to be done in this state as a part of its revenue laws in the case of every common carrier engaged in interstate as well as intrastate business, and we have yet to hear of the slightest complaint touching the difficulty or impracticability of so doing. True it is that in the case of most, and we may say all, common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, the deprivation of local business is an injury and impairment of their business as a whole. But this is equally true of every commercial corporation likewise engaged in interstate and domestic business. Nor have we yet been told, nor are we told by this last decision of the Supreme Court, that this is a fundamental ground for destroying a state privilege tax otherwise constitutional. True, also, it is that in Western Union v. Kansas it is said that:

> "We cannot fail to recognize the intimate connection which, at this date, exists between the interstate business done by interstate companies and the local business which, for the convenience of the people, must be done or can generally be better and more economically done by such interstate companies rather than by domestic companies organized to conduct only local business."

But in that same connection it is said that:

> "It is of the last importance that the freedom of interstate commerce shall not be trammeled or burdened by local regulations which, under the guise of regulating local affairs, really burdens rights secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States."

But as a state may absolutely exclude even a common carrier from doing a local business within its territory, and as this has been distinctly and in terms held in Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 17 Sup. Ct. 214, 41 L. Ed. 586, and Pullman v. Adams, 189 U. S. 420, 23 Sup. Ct. 494, 47 L. Ed. 877, where in the prevailing opinion in the Western Union Telegraph Company Case it is said, referring to these two cases, both dealing with common carriers, "The company cannot complain of being taxed for the privilege of doing a local business which it is free to renounce, and as, in even stronger language, the same principle is declared in Horn Silver Mining Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 12 Sup. Ct. 403, 36 L. Ed. 164, it is not permissible for us to hold that the mere interference with or deprivation of local business by a state statute not in itself otherwise unconstitutional becomes unconstitutional for its indirect influence on the interstate business of the company affected. As little are we able to perceive that the accidental fact that the White Dental Company's capital stock is $1,000,000, while its total assets aggregate $5,711,000 has any determinative value in this consideration. If a corporation called upon to pay a tax of $^1/_{50}$ of 1 per cent. of its total capital stock has assets amounting to five times the par value of its total capital stock, the tax amounts to $^1/_{250}$ of 1 per cent. upon its total assets. If another corporation, however, capitalized for the same amount, has assets to the value of only ⅕ of its capital stock, it results that the property of that corporation is taxed $^1/_{10}$ of 1 per cent. So the burden is the heavier upon the poorer corporation. And in neither case is there any attempt to segregate and impose the tax upon that portion of the property or that portion of the whole business lying within or done within the state imposing the tax. Or, again, if we consider the Kansas law in connection with the Massachusetts law, it is indisputable that both levy a per centum tax in terms upon the total capital stock. An important difference in favor of the Kansas law is that when this charge is once paid, the privilege of engaging in domestic business is continuously and indefinitely assured. It is one single occupation tax. In Massachusetts, however, it is an annual burden year by year. The corporation annually must pay the per centum for the renewed right to continue in business. In Kansas a corporation with a capital stock of $2,500,000 would pay a single tax of $700. In Massachusetts that same corporation would pay annually a tax of $500. It is certainly reasonable to suppose that corporations engaging in interstate and domestic commerce desire to continue their local business for more than one year. In two years the Massachusetts tax upon this corporation would exceed the Kansas charge. So while the Supreme Court of the United States does not follow the reasoning advanced by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, which the latter court held to differentiate its revenue law from that considered in the Kansas and other cases, it does in its recitals state many of the facts which the Supreme Court of Massachusetts considered to have a determinative bearing upon the question, some of which we have just now ourselves been considering. What the Supreme Court of the United States does say is to reannounce the familiar proposition that every case involving the validity of a tax must be decided upon its own facts, and at the conclusion of this recital to declare as follows:

> "The conclusion, therefore, that the authorized capital is only used as the measure of a tax, in itself lawful, without the necessary effect of burdening interstate commerce, brings the legislation within the authority of the state. So, if the tax is, as we hold it to be, levied upon a legitimate subject of such taxation, it is not void because imposed upon property beyond the state's jurisdiction, for the property itself is not taxed. In so far as it is represented in the authorized capital stock, it is used only as a measure of taxation, and, as we have seen, such measure may be found in property or in the receipts from property not in themselves taxable."

If we analyze this language correctly, it is a declaration that if a state imposes a privilege tax upon the right of a foreign corporation to engage in strictly domestic business within that state (thus we construe the language "the tax levied upon a legitimate subject of such taxation") "this tax is not void because it is imposed (levied or assessed) upon property beyond the state's jurisdiction" for the reason that "the property itself is not taxed. The authorized capital stock is used only as a measure of taxation." Still further paraphrasing this language, we are unable to perceive that it means anything other than if a state desires to impose an occupation tax upon a foreign corporation for the right to do a strictly domestic business within its limits, it may impose this license tax upon the capital stock of the corporation, because, notwithstanding that the tax is imposed upon the capital stock and thus upon property beyond the state's jurisdiction, the Supreme Court of the United States will hold that the tax is valid, because it will say that in the last analysis the property itself is not taxed, but that the capital stock is used only as a "measure of taxation." Again, we fail to perceive how every word of this might not equally well have been said in the Western Union Telegraph Company Case, thus forcing the irresistible conclusion that the Supreme Court has receded from the position which it took, and has abandoned the views which it expressed in that and the like cases. But again, unfortunately, we are confronted in the same opinion with the declaration of the court that it has "no disposition to limit the authority of those cases." We are constrained to admit our inability to harmonize this language and these decisions, though we make haste to add that undoubtedly the failure must come from our own deficient powers of perception and ratiocination, and for this deficiency it is no consolation to us to note that our Brethren of the Supreme Court of Montana are similarly afflicted, for they, too, declare State ex rel. v. Alderson, 140 Pac. 82:

> "We are unable to appreciate the distinction attempted to be made by the Supreme Court of the United States between the Kansas statute, considered in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Kansas, and held to impose a general tax upon all of the property of the company, and the statute of Massachusetts, considered in Baltic Mining Co. and S. S. White Dental Co. v. Commonwealth, 231 U. S. 68, 34 Sup. Ct. 15, 58 L. Ed. 127, and held to be a mere excise."

We have said here, as well as in Mulford Co. v. Curry, that we sought to arrive at, and thought we had arrived at, the fundamental and governing principle of the decisions, which was that to tax the total capital stock of a corporation for the indicated purposes compelled the corporation paying the tax to submit to two unconstitutional burdens, and that while in dollars and cents the same charge might be imposed upon the corporation, this particular form of tax could not be permitted. It is apparent from the last decision of the Supreme Court that in some forms it is permitted, and only the Supreme Court of the United States can say what are the permitted forms. We have reached the point where, if it be said that the state occupation or privilege charge be an excise tax (and every one of them of necessity must be excise taxes), then it is not a property tax. And even if it be in terms a percentage tax upon the capital stock of a corporation, if it be said that this is not a tax on the capital stock, but that the capital stock and per centum are taken as constituting merely a convenient measuring rod for fixing the tax, then the property is not taxed, and all constitutional objections are obviated.

[3] As these questions greatly affect the revenues as well as the rights of the states, as the determination of each one of them is to rest upon its facts, and as, in the event of a decision adverse to a state by its own courts, the state, because of a most unfortunate hiatus in the law, is deprived of a right of a review of the question by the Supreme Court of the United States, we are moved in the present condition of the decisions to hold, and we do hold, that as to both of the license fees in question their payment is exacted as a privilege or occupation tax exclusively upon the right to do a domestic business within the state of California; that these taxes are excise taxes and not property taxes, and that the tax is not on, nor based on, the capital stock of the corporation, but is merely admeasured by that capital stock; that in every case, and so in this case, it is practicable (for what it may be worth) to segregate the strictly domestic business of a corporation from its interstate business; that the case of Mulford Co. v. Curry should no longer be regarded as an authority; that the respondent in this case should pay the fees prescribed by our law; that the general demurrer sustained to defendant and appellant's answer in the trial court should not have been sustained; that the judgment rendered in favor of respondent in the trial court should be reversed and the relief accorded it denied. And in conclusion we may add that if again we are mistaken, at least the doors of the Supreme Court of the United States are open for the correction of our error.

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed.

BIAS v. REED et al. (S. F. 6485.)

1. Trial (§ 109*)—Direction of Verdict on Opening Statement.

While a verdict should not be directed in advance of the introduction of evidence on the opening statement of one of the parties unless it is clear that counsel has undertaken to state all of the facts which he expects to prove, and it is plainly evident that the facts thus to be proved will not constitute a cause of action or defense, where these conditions are complied with the court may accept the statements and admissions of counsel and direct a verdict required by such statements and admissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 91, 270, 367, 388, 395; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 927*)—Review—Directed Verdict.

In reviewing an order directing a verdict on the opening statement of one of the parties, every fact which counsel has stated as among the matters to be proved, together with all favorable inferences reasonably to be drawn therefrom, must be accepted as facts which would have been proved had the case been tried.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2912, 2917, 3748, 3758, 4024; Dec. Dig. § 927.*]

3. Husband and Wife (§ 129*)—Community Property—Estoppel—Knowledge of Husband.

That a wife, to whom her husband had conveyed land, by her acts and conduct intentionally led her husband to believe that she considered the property to be community property, did not constitute an estoppel, where the facts respecting the ownership of the land were as completely known to the husband as to the wife, and the husband was not led, by his belief that she considered the property to be community property, to take or omit any action material to the protection of his interests.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 283, 468–470; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

4. Deeds (§ 211*)—Evidence—Sufficiency.

In an action by the administrator of a wife against the administrator of her husband to quiet title, evidence that the husband executed a deed to the wife which he handed to her after being advised that a delivery was necessary to vest title in her, and that nothing was said relative to the deed not taking effect unless he died first, made a prima facie case for the wife's administrator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 637–647; Dec. Dig. § 211.*]

5. Husband and Wife (§ 47*)—Title to Land.

A husband by remaining in possession of land conveyed to his wife, farming it and paying the taxes thereon, and conveying parts of it, could not regain title unless he maintained an adverse possession in the manner and for the time required by the Code.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 232–241; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

6. Husband and Wife (§ 16*)—Adverse Possession of Land.

Where land conveyed by a husband to his wife was occupied by both parties as their home before and after the conveyance, the joint occupancy could not furnish a basis for a claim of prescriptive title by one against the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 100–106; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

7. Husband and Wife (§ 16*)—Adverse Possession of Land.

Where a husband conveyed land to his wife by an unrecorded deed, conveyances of part of the land by him did not evidence a claim on his part adverse to that of the wife in the absence of proof that his action was known to her and that she did not assent thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 100–106; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

8. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§§ 47, 263*)—TITLE TO LAND—EVIDENCE.

Where a husband conveyed land to his wife as her separate estate, the subsequent execution of deeds by each party to the other of all of the lands owned by either, including that in question, and the deposit of such deeds with a third person for delivery to the survivor, by which transaction it was not claimed that any title passed, did not tend to show that the land in question belonged to the husband rather than the wife, or that it was community property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 232–241, 915; Dec. Dig. §§ 47, 263.*]

9. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 264*)—TITLE TO LAND—EVIDENCE.

The character of property as separate or community property is to be determined from proof showing the mode of its acquisition, rather than by the declarations of the parties, and while the declarations of a wife that property conveyed to her by the husband was community property might have some weight if supported by proof of other facts, or if the evidence regarding the acquisition of title were consistent with either a separate or community character, it was not sufficient alone to overcome proof that the land was conveyed by a deed stating that she was to hold it as her separate estate, and that the husband relinquished all right or claim to it as community property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 916; Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

10. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 266*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY — PROPERTY CONVEYED BY HUSBAND TO WIFE.

Where property was conveyed by a husband to his wife as her separate estate, the husband relinquishing all claim thereto as community property, it could thereafter become community property only by a conveyance by her or an agreement between the husband and wife pursuant to Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159, authorizing a husband and wife to contract with each other respecting property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. §§ 925–928; Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

11. EVIDENCE (§ 273*) — ADMISSIONS — DECLARATIONS AGAINST INTEREST.

The declarations of a wife that a deed to her from her husband was not to become effective unless she survived her husband were provable as declarations against interest, if the fact admitted by her was material.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1108–1120; Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

12. EVIDENCE (§ 444*)—PAROL OR EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE—DELIVERY OF DEED—CONDITIONAL DELIVERY.

Under Civ. Code, § 1056, providing that a grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally, and that delivery to him is necessarily absolute and the instrument takes effect, discharged of any condition, where a husband who had been advised that delivery was necessary to pass title, delivered to his wife a deed conveying land to her, and no right to recall the deed or revoke the delivery was retained, it could not be shown that the deed was not to be effective unless the wife survived the husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1929–1944, 2049; Dec. Dig. § 444.*]

13. DEEDS (§ 66*)—DELIVERY—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

Whether or not a deed has been delivered either to the grantee or to a depositary is a question of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 127, 633; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

14. DEEDS (§ 56*)—DELIVERY—ACTS CONSTITUTING—NECESSITY OF INTENTION.

To constitute a delivery of a deed a manual tradition of the instrument is not sufficient unless accompanied by the intent of presently transferring title, and unhampered by the reservation of a right of revocation or recall.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 117–123, 125; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; John Hunt, Acting Judge.

Action by W. H. Bias, administrator with the will annexed of Elizabeth Reed, deceased, against William H. Reed, administrator with the will annexed of James Reed, deceased, and another. From a judgment on a directed verdict for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edw. F. Fitzpatrick and Ross & Ross, all of Redwood City, for appellants. Chas. M. Cassin, of San Jose, Harry J. Bias, of Santa Cruz, and James L. Atteridge, of San Jose (Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A hearing in bank of this cause was ordered after judgment in department 1.

Upon further consideration of the questions involved we have reached the conclusion that the views heretofore expressed in department are correct, and the department opinion is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court in bank. For the reasons stated in that opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

The following is a copy of the opinion of department 1:

This is an action by the administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of Elizabeth Reed, deceased, against the administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of James Reed, deceased, and M. J. Perry, to quiet title to a tract of 152 acres of land in San Mateo county and to recover possession of the same from defendants together with the value of the use and occupation thereof. James Reed and Elizabeth Reed, the testator and testatrix represented by the two administrators here contesting, were husband and wife. The plaintiff's complaint alleged that, at the time of her death, and long prior thereto, his testatrix had been the owner of the tract in controversy. The defendants answered, denying that Elizabeth Reed had at any time been the owner of the property and asserting that James Reed had at all times until his death been the owner and in the possession of said property. Other matters, which so far as they are deemed important will be referred to hereafter, were set up by an amended answer. The action came on for trial before the court and a jury. The plaintiff introduced his evidence and submitted his case. Thereupon one of the attorneys for the defendants made an opening statement detailing the facts that the defendants intended to prove. Upon this statement the plaintiff moved the court to direct the jury to bring in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and the court granted this motion. From the judgment entered pursuant to this verdict the defendants appeal.

[1] It is no doubt true, as is argued by the appellants, that the practice of directing a verdict, in advance of the introduction of evidence, upon the opening statement of one or the other party, is a dangerous one, and that an order granting such motion can be upheld only where it is clear that counsel has undertaken to state all of the facts which he expects to prove, and it is plainly evident that the facts thus to be proved will not constitute a cause of action or a defense, as the case may be. "We would observe," said this court in Emmerson v. Weeks, 58 Cal. 382, "that it would be much better not to nonsuit on an opening statement, unless it is clearly made, and it is * * * evident therefrom that no case can be made out." Where, however, these conditions are complied with, the court is authorized to accept the statements and admissions of counsel and to direct a verdict required by such statements or admissions. 38 Cyc. 1567; Oscanyan v. Arms Co., 103 U. S. 261, 26 L. Ed. 539; Liverpool, etc., S. S. Co. v. Immigration Com's, 113 U. S. 33, 5 Sup. Ct. 352, 28 L. Ed. 899; Lindley v. A., T. & S. F. R. R. Co., 47 Kan. 432, 28 Pac. 201; Pratt v. Conway, 148 Mo. 291, 49 S. W. 1028, 71 Am. St. Rep. 602. In Estate of McNeill, 155 Cal. 333, 100 Pac. 1086, where conflicting petitions for letters of administration of the estate of a decedent were presented, the court, after hearing the proof in support of one of the petitioners and an opening statement on behalf of the other, nonsuited the latter and directed a verdict in favor of the former. The judgment was upheld on appeal; the court concluding that the facts offered to be shown on behalf of the appellant would not have entitled her to a grant of letters.

[2] In reviewing an order directing a verdict on an opening statement, the appellate court must apply rules analogous to those which govern it in reviewing an order granting a nonsuit after the introduction of evidence. Every fact which counsel has stated as among the matters to be proved, together with all favorable inferences reasonably to be drawn therefrom, must be accepted by the court as facts which would have been proved if the case had been allowed to be tried.

It is entirely clear from the record that the opening statement made by the appellants here was full and complete. After counsel had first outlined the facts to be proved, the plaintiff moved the court for the directed verdict. Counsel for the appellant declared his readiness "to argue that proposition right now." The court thereupon directed that the reporter read over the opening statement, suggesting that counsel for the appellants might have omitted something. In response to this suggestion appellants' counsel amplified his statement, whereupon argument on the motion proceeded, and, as already stated, the court directed a verdict in accordance with the motion. Under these circumstances, there is, of course, no ground for the claim that the statement was made without an understanding of the necessity for making it exhaustive or that any substantial fact intended to be proved was omitted therefrom by inadvertence. The further question, then, is whether the facts so offered to be proved, if accepted as true, were such as to have constituted any defense to the action.

The plaintiff had introduced evidence tending to prove the following facts: Elizabeth Reed, the wife, died on December 19, 1908. James Reed, the husband, died on the 19th of October, 1910. In July, 1883, James Reed owned the tract of land in question and other lands in San Mateo; all of said lands being community property. The property in controversy was occupied by Reed and his wife as their home. On July 21, 1883, Mr. and Mrs. Reed were visiting at the home of the plaintiff in Santa Cruz. At the request of James Reed, the plaintiff, Bias, accompanied Reed to the office of Z. N. Goldsby, an attorney at law then engaged in practice at Santa Cruz. Reed stated to Goldsby that he desired to make a deed of the property to his wife. Goldsby wrote a deed of gift of the property in controversy and had such deed ready for execution on the afternoon of the same day, when Reed, accompanied by Mrs. Reed, Bias and John D. Chace, returned to his office. At that time the deed was read over in the presence of these persons (except, perhaps, Mr. Chace), and Reed assented to it. Reed signed the deed and acknowledged it. At the same time a will in which Mrs. Reed was named as sole beneficiary was executed by Reed, Bias and Chace signing as attesting witnesses. They also signed as witnesses to the grantor's signature upon the deed. Prior to this time Mr. Goldsby had advised Reed that it was necessary to deliver the deed in order to vest title in his wife, and after the signing and acknowledgment of the paper Reed handed it to Mrs. Reed. The deed itself was introduced in evidence. The foregoing facts with reference to the signing and delivery of the deed were testified to by Bias and Goldsby. Chace had died prior to the trial. Mr. Goldsby further testified that at the time of the delivery nothing was said with reference to the deed not taking effect unless Reed died before his wife.

Upon Mrs. Reed's death in 1908 search for the deed was made without avail. After James Reed's death a sister of Mrs. Reed prosecuted further inquiries and finally discovered the deed under the linoleum on the floor of the room which had been occupied by the Reeds. The plaintiff's case also included some testimony regarding declarations made by James Reed after the date of the deed in question and tending to support the wife's title. The possession of the land by the defendants was admitted.

This was the state of the case when the defendants made their opening statement. The statement is somewhat protracted, but we think its substance is fairly contained in the following summary: Counsel, after stating that he would introduce deeds showing the acquisition of the property in question by James Reed, went on to state that he would prove that at various times after 1883 James Reed deeded portions of the land to various persons without having his wife join in the conveyances. He declared his intention of showing, further, that in 1901 Mr. and Mrs. Reed sent for one Levy and requested him to prepare deeds from Reed to Mrs. Reed and from Mrs. Reed to Reed of all of the lands owned by either, including the tract in controversy. These deeds were subsequently prepared, were executed and acknowledged by the respective parties and were put in the possession of Levy, who was directed to hold them and upon the death of either Mr. or Mrs. Reed to deliver to the survivor for record the deed of the one so dying. A controversy subsequently arose between the Reeds and Levy, and the Reeds requested one Coburn to draw similar deeds to take the place of the two that had been deposited with Levy. This transaction, however, was never consummated. The opening statement went on to state that in December, 1908, shortly prior to Mrs. Reed's death, she made a will in which she declared that all of the property was community property. It was stated that the appellants would show that Mrs. Reed had stated to one Thompson, a physician, that the deed of July 21, 1883, "was made and given to her with the understanding that it should not become effective unless she should outlive her husband." Just prior to Mrs. Reed's death, she requested Mr. Thompson to prepare a will for her and had declared that the property in question was the community property of herself and her husband, but no will was prepared by Mr. Thompson. Reference was made to other witnesses who would testify to oral declarations of Mrs. Reed that she considered the property community property; that she owned one half of it and Mr. Reed the other half. Another witness, it was stated, would testify that in 1905 both Mr. and Mrs. Reed stated to him that the property was community property and that they had arranged their affairs so that whoever should outlive the other should get all the property. Counsel also undertook to show that at all times down to the death of Reed he had entire charge of the property, farmed it, and paid all expenses in connection with it and during all this time the property had been assessed to and the taxes paid by him.

[3] The answer contains a plea of estoppel and with reference to this counsel incorporated into the opening a statement "to the effect that Mrs. Reed, by her acts and conduct, intentionally led her husband to believe, and that he did believe that she considered all this property to be the community property of herself and her husband and not her separate property." With reference to the matter last quoted, it is quite obvious that the statement of counsel falls far short of meeting the requirements of estoppel in pais. The facts with respect to the ownership of the land were as completely known to Reed as they were to his wife. It was not stated that she induced a mistaken belief regarding any such fact. All that counsel claimed was that Mrs. Reed led her husband to believe that she "considered" the land to be community property. It is not apparent that her opinion of the legal status of the property could have any bearing upon her husband's rights or conduct, and the statement of counsel contains no intimation that Reed, if he was induced by her to believe that she "considered" the property to be community, was led by this belief to take or omit any action material to the protection of his interests. Without further discussion of this question, we simply refer to Boggs v. Merced M. Co., 14 Cal. 279, 367, 368, where the court, in considering the necessary elements of estoppel in pais, defined those elements in language which has been quoted and followed many times.

[4] That the plaintiff made out a clear prima facie case is not to be doubted. If the issues had been submitted to the jury on the plaintiff's evidence alone, the court could not properly have sanctioned a verdict in favor of the defendants. The question, then, is whether the matters which defendants declared they would prove—and which we must assume they were able to prove—were, in law, sufficient to meet or overcome the prima facie case established by the plaintiff.

[5-7] The fact that James Reed remained in possession of the land, farming it and paying taxes upon it, would not be effective to weaken or impair the title of his wife. If title had passed to her by a conveyance executed in 1883, no ownership or control asserted by her husband thereafter would revest title in him, unless he had maintained an adverse possession in the manner and for the time required by the Code. There is nothing here to indicate that the possession was adverse at all. The tract was occupied by both parties as their home, before and after the conveyance to Mrs. Reed. The occupancy was consistent with an ownership by either husband or wife. It was, in fact, a joint occupancy, and could not, on the facts offered to be shown, furnish the basis for a claim of prescriptive title by one against the other. First N. B. v. Guerra, 61 Cal. 109; Mauldin v. Cox, 67 Cal. 387, 7 Pac. 804. The same conclusion applies to the statement that James Reed had conveyed parts of the land after 1883. Since the record title remained in him, this was a convenient mode of transfer, and it would not evidence a claim adverse to that of the wife, in the absence, at least, of proof that the husband's action was known to the wife and that she did not assent to it. The matters just discussed, which, as we have seen, did not make out a title by prescription, could certainly have had no effect as bearing directly upon the transaction of July 21, 1883. The force of an executed conveyance is not to be impaired by subsequent acts or declarations of the grantor.

[8] Another part of the opening statement had to do with the deposit with one Levy of deeds from Reed to his wife and from her to him. It is not claimed that any title passed by this transaction. See Kenney v. Parks, 125 Cal. 146, 57 Pac. 772. This being so, we are unable to see that the offered testimony tended in any way to meet the case already made by the plaintiff. The fact that the Reeds made an ineffectual attempt to provide for the transfer, upon the death of one of them, of all property owned by either to the survivor, does not indicate that any particular parcel of that property belonged to one, rather than the other, or that it was community property. The subsequent talk with Coburn, looking to a second arrangement of like kind, was never consummated, and is, of course, entitled to no greater weight than may be given to the deposit of the deeds with Levy.

[9, 10] The opening statement contained, in addition to the various items already discussed, a promise to prove certain acts and declarations of Mrs. Reed. Counsel undertook to show that in her will, made shortly before her death in December, 1908, Mrs. Reed had declared that the property was community property. Oral statements to the same effect had been made by her to different persons at various times. This court has, on several occasions, expressed the view that the character of the ownership of property, whether separate or community, is to be determined by the proof showing the mode of acquisition, rather than by any declaration of one of the parties that the property was or was not community property. Estate of Grannis, 142 Cal. 1, 75 Pac. 324; Estate of Learned, 156 Cal. 311, 104 Pac. 315; Estate of Claiborne, 158 Cal. 648, 112 Pac. 278. It would seem, however, that such declaration is admissible in evidence against the declarant or his successors in interest. In re Bauer, 79 Cal. 304, 21 Pac. 759. In the very recent case of Estate of Hill, 138 Pac. 690, the admissibility of such declarations was asserted in an opinion which had the concurrence of only three members of the court, three of the remaining justices joining in the judgment upon grounds which did not require them to state their views on this point. But, assuming the admissibility of Mrs. Reed's declarations that the property was community, we think this evidence standing alone cannot be deemed sufficient to overcome the uncontradicted proof that the land was conveyed to her by her husband by means of a deed which, in express and elaborate terms, stated that she was to hold the land as her separate estate, the grantor relinquishing "all right or claim to the same or any part thereof as community property." A declaration that the property was community estate might properly be regarded as having some weight, if supported by proof of other facts pointing in the same direction, or if the evidence regarding the acquisition of title were consistent with either the separate or community character of the ownership. But under the evidence which had been here introduced, the husband had conveyed the property to the wife by a deed which, by its express declarations, as well as by the presumptions of law (Estate of Klumpke, 139 Pac. 1062) made the property her separate estate. It could become community property thereafter only by an agreement between herself and her husband. Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159; Yoakum v. Kingery, 126 Cal. 33, 58 Pac. 324. There was no offer to prove either a conveyance by her or an agreement with her husband. It having been clearly shown that the property had been acquired by her as her separate estate, her mere declaration that it was community would not, we are satisfied, be enough to sustain a finding that she had conveyed to her husband or had agreed with him that it should belong to the community.

[11-14] The only remaining piece of evidence which defendants announced their intention of introducing consisted of the declaration of Mrs. Reed to Mr. Thompson that the deed of July 21, 1883, had been made and given with the understanding that it should not become effective unless she should outlive her husband. As a declaration against interest this was admissible if the fact thus stated by Mrs. Reed militated in any way against the validity of the title claimed by plaintiff as her administrator. We think the alleged fact could have no such operation. Whether or not a deed has been delivered, either to the grantee or to a depositary is a question of fact. A manual tradition of the instrument is not sufficient, unless the passing of the paper is accompanied by the intent of presently transferring title to the property, and be unhampered by the reservation of a right of revocation or recall. Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 758, 112 Pac. 544.

"No precise form of words and no particular character of act is necessary. * * * Any words or acts showing an intention on the part of the grantor that the deed shall be considered as completely executed, and the title conveyed, are sufficient. * * * When a deed is executed and the minds of the parties to it meet, expressly or tacitly, in the purpose to give it present effect, the deed is validly delivered." Moore v. Trott, 162 Cal. 275, 122 Pac. 462.

The deed here in question was handed by the grantor to the grantee. No third party was interposed as depositary. Before the signing of the deed James Reed had been advised that in order to pass title it was necessary for him to make delivery to the grantee. If Mr. Thompson had been allowed to testify as it was stated he would testify, the declaration of Mrs. Reed could have had no greater force than to show that the paper had been delivered to her upon the condition that, if she did not survive her husband, the property would not pass to her, but that, if he died first, the title should vest in her. No right to recall the deed or to revoke the delivery was retained. In one event title was to pass. In the other it was not. But it was not contemplated that under either contingency anything further was to be done. If the fact upon which the title was to pass (i. e., the death of Reed during the life of his wife) should occur, the deed was to become operative by virtue of the delivery made on the 21st day of July, 1883, which was the only delivery which the parties ever had in mind. We have, then, the case of a delivery, to the grantee, upon a condition which may, according to the outcome, make the transfer effective or nugatory. Such a delivery, if made to a third party, might have been ineffectual. But where the deed is handed to the grantee personally, the situation is different. In that case, the condition is, by the law, discarded, and the delivery is regarded as absolute. Such is the express declaration of our statutes. Section 1056 of the Civil Code provides:

"A grant cannot be delivered to the grantee conditionally. Delivery to him, or to his agent as such, is necessarily absolute, and the instrument takes effect thereupon, discharged of any condition on which the delivery was made."

Under this section, the proof offered would not have justified the court in ruling that anything but an absolute delivery, free of condition, has been shown. The precise point was involved in Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 471, 25 Pac. 17, and the court there held, on a state of facts identical, so far as the point under discussion is concerned, with those here presented, that the deed was operative as an immediate, absolute conveyance. See, also, Elliott v. Merchants B. & T. Co., 22 Cal. App. 536, 132 Pac. 280; Hammond v. McCollough, 159 Cal. 639, 115 Pac. 216.

Such cases as Kenney v. Parks, 137 Cal. 527, 70 Pac. 556, Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 279, 37 Pac. 939, and Denis v. Velati, 96 Cal. 223, 31 Pac. 1, are not in conflict with the views herein expressed. In Kenney v. Parks, the parties were under the mistaken belief that a deed, although delivered, did not transfer title until recordation, a mutual mistake which, as is said in Hammond v. McCollough, supra, "conclusively established the absence of an intent to create a present and a new vestiture of title." Black v. Sharkey and Denis v. Velati were decisions laying down the unquestioned rule that the manual tradition of a deed unaccompanied by the purpose or intention of passing title is not a good delivery. In none of these cases was the court dealing with a situation of a delivery made to the grantee, both parties intending that in a certain event title should pass by virtue of the delivery then and there made.

The conclusion to be drawn from the foregoing discussion is that the facts contained in the opening statement of defendants, if proved, would not have raised a substantial conflict authorizing the jury to find against the plaintiff's claim of title. This being so, it was not error for the court to direct a verdict in plaintiff's favor. No other points are made.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HARRIS. (Cr. 1848.)

1. Homicide (§ 179*)—Evidence—Insanity.

Where insanity is a defense, the mental condition of any of the relatives of accused is material, and on that subject a reasonable latitude should be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 380; Dec. Dig. § 179.*]

2. Criminal Law (§ 452*)—Competency of Witnesses—Opinion as to Sanity.

A witness cannot give his opinion as to the sanity of relatives of accused, relying on insanity, without preliminarily showing that he is qualified to express an opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1053–1055; Dec. Dig. § 452.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 452*) — Competency of Witnesses—Opinion as to Sanity.

The mother of accused, who was charged with murder and relied on insanity as a defense may not express her opinion as to whether, on one occasion, when the father of accused fell to the floor at home and frothing at the mouth, his condition resulted from intoxication or temporary insanity in the absence of a preliminary showing that she is qualified to express an opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1053–1055; Dec. Dig. § 452.*]

4. Homicide (§ 339*)—Appeal—Evidence—Harmless Error.

Where the mother of one charged with murder and relying on the defense of insanity testified fully as to the circumstances of the birth of accused and as to his health, conduct, habits, peculiar temperament, and the physical and mental defects of his infancy and manhood, as she observed him, the refusal to permit her to testify whether she, before his birth, suffered inconvenience or pain, and whether at his birth a physician had not difficulty in causing the child to breathe, was not prejudicial to accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 714; Dec. Dig. § 339.*]

5. Homicide (§ 179*) — Evidence — Admissibility.

Where accused, defending a charge of murder on the ground of insanity, had spent a great deal of his time in attempting to perfect inventions, refusal to permit him to show what the inventions were, with a view of having them introduced in evidence to show that a systematic defect ran through all of them, was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 380; Dec. Dig. § 179.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 339*) — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

Where accused admitted the killing of decedent and taking her money, and his mother testified that she had given him money when he wanted it and had never refused to do so, and an uncle testified that he had given him money, and there was evidence that accused was usually occupied and in the receipt of wages, refusal to permit the mother to testify whether, at the time of the killing, she had money and whether accused knew it, and the refusal to permit the uncle to testify whether he had ever refused to give accused money, was not an unreasonable curtailment of the right of accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 714; Dec. Dig. § 339.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 179*)—INSANITY—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The acts and declarations of accused, relying on insanity, made a reasonable time before and after the crime, may be shown on the question of insanity at the time of the criminal act, where they appear to have any tendency to show his mental condition at that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 380; Dec. Dig. § 179.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 670*)—EVIDENCE—OFFER OF EVIDENCE—NECESSITY.

Refusal to allow the mother of one accused of murder and relying on insanity as a defense to state a conversation which she had with him at supper the evening of the crime was not erroneous, in the absence of any offer of what was intended to be shown by it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 757, 1593–1596; Dec. Dig. § 670.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1141*) — APPEAL — REVERSIBLE ERROR.

Error warranting a reversal of a conviction must affirmatively appear in the record, so as to permit the court on appeal to determine whether a substantial right of accused was prejudiced thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3014, 3015, 3020, 3022, 3023; Dec. Dig. § 1141.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 449*)—EVIDENCE—GOOD CHARACTER OF ACCUSED—ADMISSIBILITY.

Accused may not show the opinion of witnesses as to his truthfulness and honesty, but he is limited to evidence of general good character, and the rule is not different where insanity is a defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1034–1037, 1040–1057; Dec. Dig. § 449.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 667*)—TRIAL—READING OF EVIDENCE TO JURY.

Denial of a motion of accused to have the testimony given by him and his mother read to the jury on the ground that much of the testimony was given in so low a tone of voice as not to be heard by the jury was not erroneous, where their answers, when inaudible, were either read by the reporter or repeated by them and where the jury, though hearing the motion, did not express any desire to hear the testimony read though asked if they desired it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1599, 1601; Dec. Dig. § 667.*]

12. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—INSTRUCTIONS— MALICE.

The giving by the court, in its instructions, of the general definition of malice in Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 4, was not prejudicial error, where the definition in section 188 of malice essential to constitute homicide was also given.

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court in its main charge correctly stated the law on the burden of proving insanity and on other issues raised, accused could not complain because the court gave, at his request, a conflicting erroneous instruction that where accused was charged with homicide, and offered evidence to show that the condition of his mind, through predisposition, was such that he was incapable of deliberation, the reasonable doubt as to capacity for deliberation should be resolved in his favor to the extent of acquitting him of the higher grade and convicting him of the lower grade.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3128, 3154–3157, 3159–3163, 3169; Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

14. HOMICIDE (§ 237*) — INSANITY — PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE.

Accused, charged with murder in the first degree, must sustain his defense of insanity by a preponderance of the evidence where the facts of the killing leave no other rational inference than that it was done with deliberate intention if he was sane.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 500; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

15. HOMICIDE (§ 144*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—INSANITY.

The burden is on the prosecution to prove the elements of the crime, which involves proof of a mind sufficiently sane to be capable of committing the crime or any degree thereof, but affirmative proof of sanity is not required.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 261; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

16. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 311*) — BURDEN OF PROOF—INSANITY—PRESUMPTIONS.

The presumption of sanity of accused is equivalent to proof of sanity as a fact, until the contrary is shown, and the presumption is conclusive in the absence of evidence of accused contravening it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 742–744; Dec. Dig. § 311.*]

17. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 939*) — NEW TRIAL — GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is properly denied in the absence of any showing of any diligence to discover or produce it at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2318–2323; Dec. Dig. § 939.*]

Upon the trial the homicide by defendant was admitted. The sole defense was insanity. As there was no dispute on the trial respecting the circumstances attending the killing of deceased by defendant and no question is raised on this appeal as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding of the jury (necessarily implied from their verdict) against the defense of insanity interposed by defendant or the verdict returned against him, a general statement of these matters need only be made.

The victim was a Mrs. Rebecca P. Gay, a Christian Science practitioner having her office in the H. W. Hellman building in the city of Los Angeles. Defendant visited her office on the afternoon of September 26, 1913. He was not acquainted with her nor had he ever seen her before. He told her that he was seeking a Mrs. Wallace, whom he expected to meet at the office. He was told by Mrs. Gay that she knew no one by that name nor expected a visit from such a party. Defendant, however, insisted that this Mrs. Wallace would call there, and was permitted to sit in the reception room of the office and wait her expected arrival. He waited there about an hour—until nearly 5 o'clock—when a patient whom Mrs. Gay had been attending in the inner office departed, leaving defendant and Mrs. Gay alone in the reception room. That was the last seen of the latter alive. Next morning her dead body was, by a janitress of the building, found lying in the office. Letters and papers were scattered over her body. A handbag and purse in which Mrs. Gay carried her money was found in the office, the latter empty. An autopsy showed—to state it briefly—that Mrs. Gay had been killed by repeated blows from some blunt instrument on her face and head which had fractured the skull in numerous places. Defendant was suspected of the homicide, and arrested in the city of San Diego on October 5, 1913, and confessed that he had done the killing. He also testified as a witness on the trial and detailed the circumstances of Mrs. Gay's death at his hands. He testified that for some three years previous to the homicide he had at occasional times suffered from fits resulting in a loss of consciousness; that at those times, covering a period of from days to several weeks, he would have spells of sickness accompanied by lapses of memory; that sometimes also during these spells he would hear voices of unknown and unseen persons telling him that he was threatened with great injury or death by some person, and urging him to seek and kill such person to protect himself, and the voices kept constantly urging him to do the things they said; that he was made angry and fearful at these times by these suggestions and promptings; that a feeling or impulse to do as the voices urged would come over him, which he would try to resist, but which he could not succeed in doing; that for a week previous to his killing of Mrs. Gay, he was suffering under one of these spells, during which the voices kept constantly telling him that a Mrs. Wallace (a person he did not know) intended to kill him and that he must seek and kill her; that he would find her somewhere in the Hellman building; that when he called at Mrs. Gay's office he thought he would find this Mrs. Wallace there or that she would come in during that afternoon; that after he had been sitting in the reception room for about half an hour he heard these voices again, and they kept telling him that Mrs. Gay was this Mrs. Wallace he was seeking and that he must kill her; that when a patient on whom Mrs. Gay was attending left the office he and Mrs. Gay were alone; that immediately the telephone in the office rang, and as Mrs. Gay was seated at the desk answering it he approached and struck her on the head with a piece of iron pipe which he had brought with him wrapped in newspaper and with which the voices had directed him to kill Mrs. Wallace; that when struck Mrs. Gay fell to the floor, and as she lay there he struck her again with the iron pipe about the head four or five violent blows. Satisfied that she was dead, he looked through her desk and scattered the papers therefrom on the floor; that while so engaged, hearing some one approaching towards the outer door of the office, he sprung the inner lock of it to prevent entrance. He took the contents of Mrs. Gay's purse—amounting to $25—and left the office, departing from the Hellman building by the back stairs. He left the piece of gas pipe used in killing the deceased by the side of her body. That night he buried the clothes he wore at the time he killed the deceased, which were spattered with blood, in a field near the residence of his mother, where he was living. The next day he departed on an early train for San Diego. At the time of his confession and on the trial he claimed that he had no remembrance of killing deceased until after his arrest by the officers when they told him of his visit to the office of Mrs. Gay, the apparent circumstances under which she was killed, the wounds inflicted, and the weapon found beside her body; that he then for the first time remembered that he had done the killing and recalled all the circumstances under which it was done.

As to the defense of insanity: It was not claimed that appellant was insane at the time of the trial, but only that he was insane when he committed the homicide. Testimony on this subject was presented to the jury quite fully on both sides. The claim on behalf of the appellant was that he was subject to intermittent attacks of a particular phase of epileptic insanity defined by the medical experts called in his behalf as psychic epileptic equivalent, a condition where instead of the usual convulsive phenomena ordinarily known as epileptic fits there are substituted from time to time certain disturbances of mentality during which the consciousness of the individual aflicted is so altered that he is deprived of the full possession of his usual faculties; he acts in a manner wholly foreign to his usual conduct, habits, and mode of thought, and thinks things are true that are not and acts upon them because he believes they are true; that a characteristic of this phase of insanity is that while suffering under it the individual may become dominated with an idea entirely imaginary that he is being persecuted or threatened with injury from some source, and will make a sudden and violent attack on some person his diseased mind suggests is the one persecuting or intending to injure him.

These medical experts gave it as their opinion from the evidence in the case and personal examination of the defendant that he was suffering from a spell of this phase of insanity when he killed deceased and was insane when he did so; that by reason thereof he was incapable of having a malicious intent to kill and incapable of deliberating upon the act of killing which he committed. The court permitted these experts to testify that from the nature of his insanity when defendant killed the deceased he was incapable of resisting an impulse to do it, but the court at the same time stated that nevertheless it would instruct the jury that in this state the doctrine of irresistible impulse as an excuse for crime did not exist, and did subsequently so instruct the jury.

On the part of the prosecution the opinion of medical experts based also on the evidence in the case and personal examination of the defendant was that he was not suffering from epileptic insanity when he killed the deceased; that he was entirely sane at the time, having mental capacity to know and understand the nature and character of the act he was committing.

As we have said, the appellant raises no question but that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury that he was sane or to sustain the verdict of murder of the first degree. His claim on this appeal is only that certain rulings of the court prejudicially prevented him from fully presenting to the jury all the testimony which he was entitled to present for their consideration on the issue of insanity; that the court also erred in other of its rulings and in the matter of the instructions given by it to the jury.

As to the rulings on the admission of testimony: Many errors on that ground are assigned by appellant, but we deem it necessary only to consider some of them. The assignments as to the others are clearly without merit.

[1, 2] In the course of the trial defendant introduced testimony which it was claimed had a tendency to show that his maternal uncle had at one period of his life become temporarily insane, and that in the infancy of the defendant his father had on one occasion fallen to the floor at home and frothed at the mouth. The mother of the defendant was asked by counsel for appellant what phase of insanity the uncle was afflicted with at that time, and a Dr. Nelson, a physician who knew the uncle, was asked whether it appeared to him that the latter was possessed of an insane delusion. These questions were objected to and the objection sustained on the ground that no foundation for the inquiries had been laid. Undoubtedly, where insanity is a defense, the mental condition of any of the relatives of the defendant is material, and on that subject, as on all inquiries relating to insanity, a reasonable latitude should be allowed. But this does not mean that the rules as to the admissibility of evidence should be relaxed. The rule is that before the opinion of witnesses as to sanity of a person or a particular phase of it can be given—and the inquiries here were simply calling for the opinion of the witnesses on that subject—it must be preliminarily shown that the witness is qualified to express it, and clearly this was not shown here.

[3] Nor can error be predicated on the ruling of the court refusing to allow the mother of the defendant to express her opinion as to whether on one occasion in their early married life, when the father of the defendant fell down and frothed at the mouth after returning home in an intoxicated condition (referred to above), this resulted from the drunken spell or was not from the cause of drink. Not only was there no showing that she was qualified to give her opinion on the subject, but it further appears that she testified that she did not know what led up to that condition.

[4] The mother of the defendant was not permitted to answer whether while he was en ventre sa mere she suffered inconvenience or pain, and whether at the birth of the defendant a physician had not difficulty in causing him to breathe. Without any infringement on the rights of the prosecution, the court might have let this testimony in. But as it is not suggested how this circumstance could have been important, particularly in view of the fact that the mother testified fully regarding the circumstances attending the birth of defendant, her long period of labor and necessarily resulting pains, and the use of instruments to effect her delivery, and, further, as to the health, conduct, habits, peculiar temperament, and physical and mental defects in infancy and manhood of the defendant as she observed him, we cannot say that this particular ruling worked such prejudice to the rights of the defendant as would make a sufficient showing to warrant a reversal.

[5] There was testimony tending to show that the defendant was employed a great deal of his time in attempting to perfect certain inventions, and it was sought to show what these inventions were, with a view to having them—some half dozen or more—introduced in evidence. The testimony respecting their character and the right to offer them was rejected by the court. Counsel for appellant claims this was error; that, if he had been permitted to introduce the inventions, it would have shown that a systematic defect ran through all of them; that, as an invention is a creation of the mind, if it be shown that the same defect is found in each of them this would have a tendency to show that there was a corresponding defect in the mind of defendant. But this evidence would have no tendency to show insanity unless as a rule it may be said—which, of course, it cannot—that unsuccessful inventors are in a measure insane. These prevailing defects would only show that the appellant was not successful in perfecting the idea contemplated in his inventions. They would have no tendency to show he was insane.

[6] The mother of the defendant, and also his uncle Lafayette Taylor, were not allowed to answer whether at the time of the killing of Mrs. Gay the mother had money and whether defendant knew it, and the uncle whether he had ever refused to give the defendant money. Counsel for appellant insists that he had a right to show that the defendant could have gotten money from his relatives if he had wanted it in opposition to the theory of the prosecution that the defendant killed Mrs. Gay for the purpose of getting money. But as the testimony of the mother in the case was that she had given the defendant money when he wanted it and had never refused to do so, and that the uncle had also given it to him, and, further, that defendant was usually occupied and in the receipt of wages, there was no unreasonable curtailment of the right of defendant in sustaining the objections to these particular inquiries.

[7-9] The court refused to allow the mother to state a conversation which she had with the defendant at supper time the evening of the homicide; or to permit her to answer whether she had "ever known him to steal anything"; or had she "always known him to be truthful"; or to permit another witness, from his association with appellant, to answer how the defendant impressed him "as to his honesty and truthfulness," and whether he observed "that he was truthful and honest." As to the inquiry of the mother concerning any conversation with the defendant, she testified that she had a conversation with him, and was asked, "What was it?" It is the rule, as claimed by appellant, that when the insanity of an accused is interposed as a defense, his acts and conduct and declarations, made a reasonable time before and after the alleged criminal act is committed may be given to the jury on the question of his insanity at the time the criminal act was committed, if they appear to have any tendency to show his mental condition at that time. People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 544, 89 Pac. 124. But here the question proposed did not indicate in the slightest that the conversation sought to be elicited would have any such tendency. Before the exclusion of a conversation which may or may not be pertinent on the question of insanity can be assigned as error it is the duty of counsel to state the nature of the statements claimed to have been made by defendant, because unless this is done the trial court cannot intelligently determine whether the matter sought to be elicited could have any bearing on the question of insanity or not. Nor can this court, in the absence of such showing, determine whether the right of the defendant had been prejudicially affected by the ruling of the court. All conversations are not admissible, but only those which have a tendency to prove the insanity of the accused. Counsel in this case, if he deemed the matter of sufficient importance, should have made a formal statement or offer of what he intended to prove. Such a proceeding is in harmony with the rule governing appeals that error warranting a reversal must affirmatively appear in the record and to also permit this court to determine whether a substantial right of a defendant has been prejudiced by a ruling assigned. People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 388; People v. Brent, 11 Cal. App. 674, 106 Pac. 110.

[10] As to the inquiry directed to the truthfulness and honesty of the defendant: What was sought was only the individual opinion of the witnesses respecting these traits of character of the defendant from observation or association with him. But such evidence is not admissible. The rule is that, where good character of an accused for certain traits is proper to go before a jury, it is only evidence of general good character which must be shown. There is no difference in the rule when insanity is a defense than of other defenses in which good character may be shown.

[11] Error is assigned in the refusal of the court on the motion of counsel for appellant to direct that the testimony given by the defendant and his mother during the trial be read to the jury at the close of the case. The claim of counsel was that much of their testimony was given by these witnesses in so low a tone of voice as to be inaudible to the jury. It is true, as it is not unusual during trials, that these witnesses sometimes answered questions in such a low tone of voice that some of the jury, the court, and counsel requested them to speak louder. But the record shows that whenever their answers were inaudible this was called to their attention by either court or counsel, and their answers either read by the reporter or repeated by the witnesses. This motion was made in the presence of the jury and they were told that if they desired the testimony of these witnesses read the court would have it done; that if they were satisfied that they had heard it no purpose could be subserved by reading it again. None of the jury expressed any desire to hear it re-read, and it must be assumed that they heard it all and did not need to have any part of it re-read to them.

[12] As to the instructions complained of: The court in its instructions on "malice," which is an element of the crime of murder, gave the general definition of that word as found in subdivision 4 of section 7 of the Penal Code. Appellant claims that the giving of this definition of malice in a case where the crime charged is murder was erroneous. It is true that the malice defined in that section of the Code is not the malice which is essential to constitute the crime of murder. The malice essential to constitute it is something distinct from the malice defined by the section referred to, and is particularly defined by section 188 of the Penal Code, a definition which was also given by the court. Prejudicial error, however, did not follow because both definitions were given. In giving the definition from section 7 the court only gave the general import of the word "malice." When it came to defining the crime of murder, with its essential elements, it correctly defined the "malice" constituting one of such elements as it is particularly defined in section 188. Under similar circumstances, it is held that the giving of the general definition, where the special definition as found in section 188 is also given, is no ground of substantial complaint. People v. Dice, 120 Cal. 201, 52 Pac. 477.

The principal contention, however, of appellant with reference to the instructions is that in its charge to the jury the court gave contradictory, confusing, and misleading instructions with reference to the defense of insanity, the burden of proof, and weight of evidence, and sets out in his brief the particular instructions which he asserts present this condition. He does not discuss particularly the instructions which he claims present it. He simply sets forth a number of them, makes the point, and cites authorities which he claims sustain his contentions.

The court gave full and clear instructions on the defense of insanity; announcing the well-established rule that, in order to be available for that purpose, it must appear that the defendant was suffering from such a diseased and deranged condition of his mental faculties as to render him incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong with reference to the particular act with which he was charged. It also instructed as to partial insanity, and further told the jury that the doctrine that under some forms of insanity a person may know the nature of the act fully, and at the same time cannot prevent it through paralysis of the will power, and which is sometimes known as uncontrollable or irresistible impulse, has no legal standing in this state and is not a legal defense to crime.

It further gave the instruction common to all criminal cases, that the burden of proof was on the prosecution to prove every fact essential to a conviction; defined reasonable doubt, and gave the usual instruction, in connection therewith, that if, after a full and fair consideration of all the evidence, the jury were satisfied there was such reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant they should acquit him. As to the burden of proof, it charged, further, that while such burden was generally upon the prosecution this was subject to the exception that when insanity is relied on as a defense to crime the burden of proving his insanity was upon the defendant and he must show by a preponderance of the evidence the existence of such insanity; that it was not proven by raising a doubt whether it existed or not. The legal accuracy of these instructions, as announcing correct principles of law for consideration by the jury as to all the matters to which they related, is not questioned by the appellant.

[13] But in addition to these instructions the court at the request of the appellant, gave the following instruction to the jury: "It is logical to hold that where the accused is charged with deliberate homicide, and offers evidence to show that the condition of his mind through predisposition was such that he was incapable of deliberation, the reasonable doubt as to such capacity for deliberation should be resolved in favor of the accused to the extent that it acquits him of the higher grade and convicts him of the lower grade of the offense." The "predisposition" referred to in the instruction doubtless was a predisposition to insanity.

It is this quoted instruction, considered in connection with the general instructions just referred to, which counsel for appellant contends created the condition of contradictory, confusing, and misleading rules given to the jury respecting the subject of insanity, the burden of proof, and the weight and sufficiency of the evidence. There is an apparent condition of conflict in these instructions, though what its effect is, as far as being prejudicial to the appellant, is a matter for subsequent consideration. While the court in its main charge correctly instructed the jury that the rule in this state is that the defense of insanity, when interposed by a defendant, must be made out by a preponderance of the evidence on his part (People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 518; People v. Allender, 117 Cal. 83, 48 Pac. 1014; People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 75 Pac. 1093; People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 138, 78 Pac. 470), in this quoted instruction it nevertheless informed them that if from the evidence introduced of a predisposition to insanity they should entertain a reasonable doubt of the capacity of the defendant to deliberate in killing deceased (deliberation being essential to constitute murder of the first degree), the defendant should be given the benefit of it and acquitted of that higher degree of murder.

[14] There is no warrant in the law of this state for any such doctrine as declared in the quoted instruction. Counsel for appellant defends it as properly applicable to the degrees of murder on the theory that while a charge of murder is established by proof simply of the killing by defendant, that such a showing constitutes only murder of the second degree; that in order to constitute murder of the first degree, it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove something more than the killing itself, namely, that the killing was committed with a deliberate intention to kill; that this deliberate purpose to kill is an essential fact necessary to be proven to constitute murder of the first degree, and the burden of proving it beyond a reasonable doubt is on the prosecution; that if a reasonable doubt of such deliberate purpose arises from the evidence, whether produced from the evidence on the issue of insanity or otherwise, the accused is entitled to the benefit of it and to an acquittal of the higher offense. All that counsel contends for as to the degrees of murder, the necessity of proving deliberation to constitute murder of the first degree, and as to the burden of proof being on the prosecution is undoubtedly true. But the fact that the defendant is accused of murder which involves degrees, and that his guilt of the higher degree can only result from proof of a deliberate intent on his part to kill, does not differentiate the rule in this state that the burden is on the defendant where the facts and circumstances of the killing leave no other rational inference than that it was done with deliberate intention if he was sane, and he asserts incapacity to have entertained such intent by reason of his insanity to sustain this defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

[15] The burden of proof is always on the prosecution to prove all the elements necessary to constitute the guilt of the defendant, and this involves proof of a mind sufficiently sane to be capable of committing crime or any degree of crime involved in the offense charged. But the law presumes all men are sane; not some degree of sanity, but that they have full mental capacity to commit any crime or degree of crime which the facts in the case establish. Express or affirmative proof of the sanity of a defendant is not required to be made by the prosecution.

[16] The presumption which the law raises is the full equivalent of proof of it as a fact, and, until the contrary is shown, the prosecution, by the presumption, has proven the sanity of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. This presumption is conclusive in the absence of any evidence on the part of the defendant contravening it. If none is introduced by him the presumption prevails, and the burden on the prosecution of proving beyond a reasonable doubt the capacity of the defendant to commit the crime charged which the facts and circumstances otherwise show beyond such doubt was committed by him is sustained. The rule prevailing in this state, and in the majority of jurisdictions elsewhere, requiring the defendant, where insanity is interposed as a defense by him, to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence, does not affect the rule that the burden of proving sanity is on the prosecution. That burden is always on it, and it is met in the first instance by the presumption which the law raises of sanity and which must prevail until it is overcome. The rule casting upon the defendant the burden of establishing his insanity by a preponderance of the evidence does not shift this burden of proof from the prosecution to him, but only shifts the burden of introducing evidence, and declares the amount or quantum of evidence which he must produce to overthrow the presumption and show his insanity. Now, in this case, the claim of the prosecution was that the defendant was guilty of murder of the first degree from the facts and circumstances shown of the killing. There was no dispute as to the facts and circumstances under which the killing of deceased by defendant was done. They were conceded, and show that the killing was committed by defendant under circumstances of peculiar atrocity and in a manner which could leave no rational inference but that it was done with deliberate purpose and intent to kill if the defendant was sane. Unless he was insane, no other verdict than that of murder of the first degree could have been returned against him. His sole defense was that he was insane to a degree that he was incapable of entertaining the deliberate intent essential to constitute first-degree murder. But the law presumed him sane, which involved the mental capacity of entertaining the deliberate intent which the conceded facts surrounding the killing rationally showed. By reason of the presumption the jury must remain convinced of his sanity or they must be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence that he was insane. There is no middle ground or intermediate rule or any rule of reasonable doubt as to insanity recognized in this state, and hence no warrant for the giving of this quoted instruction by the trial court. It had otherwise correctly instructed the jury on all matters respecting insanity as a defense and the rules under which it must be considered by the jury. As is apparent from our discussion of the subject, it was not exactly correct for the court to tell the jury that there was an exception to the rule as to the burden of proof being on the prosecution where insanity is interposed as a defense, but this does not affect the matter under consideration. It may be said that in giving the usual general instructions in criminal cases as to the right of a defendant to an acquittal if the jury, from a consideration of all the facts and circumstances, are not satisfied that the state has established every fact essential to a conviction, the court should, with regard to the defense of insanity set up by a defendant, specifically inform them of the qualification in such cases to this general rule, namely, that such defense must be established to their satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence in his favor, and that the rule of reasonable doubt does not apply as to such a defense.

But while generally the giving of conflicting or misleading instructions will warrant a reversal, this rule is subject to the exception that when this condition is not only invited by the defendant, but that its result is solely to his advantage, he has no ground of complaint. This was the situation created here. Of course, no prejudice was worked the appellant through the correct instructions given by the court. The giving of conflicting and misleading rules proceeded from the quoted instruction. But obviously the giving of this quoted instruction was decidedly to the advantage of appellant. It submitted his only defense of insanity for the consideration of the jury under the rule of reasonable doubt (to say nothing of a predisposition to insanity being any defense at all) much more favorably than he was entitled to, and hence no prejudice resulted to him nor any valid ground of complaint.

The court gave the jury an instruction with respect to the discretion vested in them should they find the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree as to whether he should be hanged or suffer life imprisonment. It is unnecessary to set forth the instruction here. It is the same instruction as was given word for word by the trial court in People v. Rogers, and the correctness of which was the subject of consideration on an appeal to this court in that case. People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 126 Pac. 143. We held there that the giving of such an instruction was not erroneous.

[17] It was not error for the court to deny the motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. There was no showing whatever of reasonable or any diligence to discover or produce at the trial the single item of evidence bearing upon the insanity of appellant which was claimed subsequently to have been discovered, and which is referred to in the affidavit of the mother filed in support of defendant's motion.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. (concurring). I concur in the foregoing opinion and judgment. The condition of our law touching instructions to the jury in the matters above discussed I take it briefly to be this: In general, if, after their review of all of the evidence, the jury entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, it is the jury's duty to give the defendant the benefit of that doubt and to acquit him. This doctrine of reasonable doubt goes not only to the whole evidence, but equally to every material issue in the case. Thus, if upon any one material issue the jury entertain such a doubt, their verdict must be acquittal. When, however, our law says, as it does with equal positiveness, that when insanity is relied upon as a defense it must be proved to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of evidence, there is presented an apparent conflict between the two doctrines. But this conflict is only apparent. When insanity is interposed as a defense, that one particular issue is removed from the operation of the rule of reasonable doubt. It forms an exception to it. Our law is this: If the jury entertain a reasonable doubt concerning the proof of any material issue in a criminal case, it must give the defendant the benefit of that doubt and acquit him, unless the particular issue be that of insanity. As to this issue a reasonable doubt is not sufficient to justify an acquittal at the hands of the jury, but they must be convinced that the defense of insanity is established by a preponderance of evidence. It would tend to clarify our criminal law if trial judges, where the occasion arises, would define this matter to the jury in some such way as that above indicated.

A lessee may not sell or otherwise dispose of the lessor's property, unless expressly or impliedly authorized so to do by the lease.

A lease of a farm and enumerated live stock for a rental of half of the increase of the stock, which provides that at the end of the term the lessee shall surrender the premises and make the number of stock good and one-half of all increase, does not authorize the lessee to sell any of the demised stock, but means that at the end of the term he must deliver up that stock and replace any portion lost during the term.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by J. C. Long against S. P. Hammond. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Cornish & Robnett, of Alturas, for appellant. Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal on the judgment roll by plaintiff from a judgment given in favor of defendant. The only question presented by the appeal is whether, under the terms of a certain lease made by plaintiff to defendant, defendant had the right to sell any of the live stock constituting a part of the demised property. If he had no such right, the judgment must be reversed.

By the lease, executed May 22, 1911, plaintiff leased to defendant a tract of land containing 160 acres, together with all farming implements and machinery on the premises, a wagon, a cart, and certain harness, and "4 cows, 12 yearlings, 7 of which are heifers and 5 steers and one bull, * * * 7 head of horses, consisting of 3 work horses, 1 three year old filly, 2 two year old geldings and one yearling filly," for the term of five years "for the rental value of one-half the increase of said stock; i. e., that is to say, that, at the end of said term of five years, the said lessee shall surrender to the lessor the said premises in good condition, wear, tear, and the elements excepted, make the number of stock herein contained good, and one-half of all increase, together with all personal effects, herein described as going with the land such as wagons, harness, farming implements, etc."

Defendant, having entered into possession of the demised property some time prior to the commencement of this action (April 13, 1912), sold the bull, three head of two year old steers, and four horses for the sum "of about $240," and, as admitted by the pleadings, appropriated the proceeds to his own use. The lower court concluded that, under the terms of the lease which we have substantially set forth, defendant was authorized to sell such property.

[1, 2] We are unable to find in the provisions of the lease any authorization to defendant to sell any of the demised property belonging to plaintiff. We have here a lease of certain specified real and personal property, including certain live stock, for the term of five years, the rental prescribed being "one-half of the increase of said stock," with covenants relative to the return of the property at the expiration of the term. No authority rests in a lessee to sell or otherwise dispose of the lessor's property, unless there be express provision therefor in the lease, or unless, by fair implication from the terms of the lease, such authority may be inferred. Certainly no such express provision was here contained, and there is no basis at all for any claim that such authorization may be inferred, except in so far as such claim may be based on the provision that at the end of the term the lessee shall surrender the premises, farming implements, etc., and "make the number of stock herein contained good." To our minds this provision furnishes no sufficient basis for any such claim. Obviously it was inserted for the purpose of requiring the lessee to replace such of the stock as might die or in some way be lost during the term. He must bear the loss and return all of the stock leased, together with one-half of the increase thereof, making good by replacing the same any portion of the stock that may have been lost during the term. This, in our opinion, is the only reasonable construction to be given to the language of the lease. It is to be observed that the only rental prescribed is one-half of the increase of the live stock that was demised. This necessarily contemplates a retention of the very live stock demised. Under defendant's theory, he might sell all of the live stock, for if he can sell any he can sell all, and refrain from replacing any of the same until the termination of the lease, thus practically depriving the lessor of rental altogether. We see no warrant in the language of the lease for the construction placed upon it by defendant.

[3] There is nothing in this case warranting the assumption that the trial court may have received parol evidence sufficient to justify it in construing the lease as authorizing the lessee to sell any of the stock demised. To our minds there is no such ambiguity in the language used with regard to any matter involved in this appeal as to have justified a resort to parol evidence to show that it was intended to give the lessee authority to sell any of the demised property. There is no question in the case as to the meaning of any or all of the words used in the provision requiring the lessee to "make the number of stock herein contained good," and neither party disputes that the words were used "in their primary and general acceptation." Code Civ. Proc. § 1861. The question is whether, when taken as so used, they can be held to imply a power of sale in the lessee. The finding of fact of the trial court, taken in connection with its conclusions of law, are consistent only with the theory that it concluded purely as a matter of law from the provisions of the lease alone, which to our minds are plain and unambiguous, that the lessee had the right under the lease to sell the property that he has disposed of.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

HIGUERA v. COREA. (S. F. 6384.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1914.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 743*)—RES JUDICATA—RIGHT TO EASEMENT—ACTION TO QUIET TITLE.

In an action to quiet title to a strip of land over which defendant claimed an easement for a roadway, a judgment in a previous action between the same parties, declaring that defendant was entitled to such easement, which judgment was affirmed on appeal, was conclusive as to the rights of the parties in the present action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1252, 1253, 1275–1277, 1284; Dec. Dig. § 743.*]

2. QUIETING TITLE (§ 44*)—EVIDENCE—FORMER JUDGMENT.

In an action to quiet title to land over which defendant claimed an easement for a roadway, a judgment rendered in a previous action between the same parties, and declaring that defendant was entitled to such easement, was admissible in evidence as proof of defendant's right to the easement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 89–92; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by Bernardo Higuera against Frank Corea. From judgment for defendant, denial of new trial, and denial of motion to set aside the judgment as contrary to the findings, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William B. Hardy, of San Jose, for appellant. William H. Johnson, of San Jose, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint of the plaintiff states a cause of action to quiet plaintiff's title to a tract of land. The prayer is that the defendant be required to set forth the interest he claims therein, and that the same be adjudged void. The defendant answered, alleging that he was the owner of an easement over the land claimed by the plaintiff, consisting of a roadway leading from the defendant's land across the plaintiff's land to a public highway. Judgment was given for the defendant, declaring him to be the owner of said easement. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, also from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and from an order denying his motion to set aside the judgment as contrary to the findings.

On the trial the defendant introduced in evidence the record of a previous action by Frank Corea against Bernardo Higuera, wherein judgment was given in favor of Corea, declaring that he was entitled to the identical easement over Higuera's land that is here in controversy. An appeal was taken in that case to this court and the judgment therein was affirmed on April 29, 1908. 153 Cal. 451, 95 Pac. 882, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1018. The amended complaint in the present action was filed September 29, 1911, and the trial was had in the following December. The description of the roadway in the judgment in the former action was in somewhat general terms. The court here, however, found that the roadway therein described was identical with that described in the defendant's answer herein.

[1, 2] The plaintiff claims that the evidence is insufficient to show that defendant had title to the easement in question. We do not think it necessary to set out the evidence in full. While it is somewhat conflicting, there is ample evidence to show the defendant's right thereto, as adjudged by the court, and that without aid from the probative effect of the former judgment. That judgment is, in itself, conclusive of the rights of the parties in this action. The finding that the description of the roadway in the former action is identical with the description in this action is not attacked by the plaintiff in his briefs. As we understand his argument, it is that the former judgment is inadmissible in evidence in this action in proof of the defense alleged, because that matter had been adjudicated and cannot be introduced in evidence in another action involving the same right. No discussion is necessary to dispose of this argument. Practically the sole purpose of resorting to courts for a judgment establishing a right is to furnish the party with a record on which he can rely as conclusive proof of his right whenever it is again disputed. It was not necessary to set up the judgment in the previous action as a former adjudication. It could be introduced in evidence as proof of the right of the defendant to the easement alleged in his answer.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SCOTT v. McPHERSON. (L. A. 3336.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1914.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 264*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

Under a complaint, in a servant's action for personal injury, alleging negligence in failing to provide a safe place to work, proof of negligence of a fellow servant was a material variance.

2. PLEADING (§ 237*)—AMENDMENT—SAME CAUSE OF ACTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 469, providing that no variance is material unless it has actually misled the adverse party, and that even then the court may order the pleadings to be amended on terms, where the complaint, in a servant's action for injury, was based on negligence in not furnishing a safe place to work, and the only proof was negligence of a fellow servant, in view of St. 1911, p. 796, § 1, declaring negligence of a fellow servant to be no defense to a servant's action for injury, the court could allow an amendment by adding allegations of negligence of a fellow servant, since the cause of action was not changed thereby; St. 1911, p. 796, § 1, having taken away the defense of fellow servant's negligence.

3. PLEADING (§ 239*)—AMENDMENT—TERMS—CONTINUANCE.

In a servant's action for personal injury, where he pleaded failure to supply a safe place to work, and he was allowed to amend to conform to proof by charging negligence of a fellow servant, the defendant was entitled to meet the new allegations by demurrer and answer and to any time reasonably necessary to enable him to obtain available evidence material to them.

5. DAMAGES (§ 173*)—IMPAIRMENT OF EARNING CAPACITY—EVIDENCE.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by James H. Scott against W. E. McPherson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lewis R. Kirby and J. T. Reed, both of San Diego, for appellant. Young C. Burkhart, of San Diego, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by him by reason of injuries received while working for defendant in the construction of a building. The case was tried by the court without a jury. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $400. Defendant appeals from such judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

On November 6, 1911, plaintiff was working for defendant as a carpenter and laborer in the construction of this building, and at the time of the accident was working in an air well about 3½ feet deep and 9½ feet wide. The building had been constructed one story above the street level, and on the upper floor several men employed by defendant in the construction of this building were working. One of these men, T. B. Thompson, was engaged in cutting off the ends of projecting steel. He was using a saw for this purpose. Having used the saw on an end projecting over the air well, and not being able to detach it with his hand, he struck it with a hand axe, thereby breaking it off and causing it to fall some 20 feet to where plaintiff was working in the air well. The piece thus detached was from 5 to 8 inches in length and from one-half to five-eighths of an inch in thickness. It struck plaintiff on the left shoulder, causing a fracture of the acromion. There was testimony sufficient to support a conclusion that the plaintiff was thereby prevented from following his avocation for a short time, and that use of the arm would be permanently impaired to a slight degree.

[1, 2] 1. The only negligence on the part of the defendant alleged in the original complaint, which was unverified, was that defendant had failed to provide plaintiff with a safe and proper place in which to work. The answer contained a general denial of all the allegations in the complaint, and set up as defense contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, and that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant of plaintiff. At the close of plaintiff's case, defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the ground, among others, that plaintiff had shown no such negligence on the part of defendant as was alleged in the complaint. The trial judge very correctly took this view of the matter, saying substantially that the only negligence shown by the evidence introduced by plaintiff was that of Thompson, a fellow servant of plaintiff. He further stated substantially that, if such negligence on the part of Thompson was alleged in the complaint as the cause of plaintiff's injury, defendant would be liable therefor to plaintiff, if the proof sustained the allegation. In this the trial judge correctly stated the law, in view of the provisions of the act relative to liability of employers for injuries or death sustained by their employés, etc., approved

April 8, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 796), which was in force at the time of the accident. That act provided, in section 1, that it shall not be a defense that the injury was caused in whole or in part by the want of ordinary or reasonable care of a fellow servant. He therefore permitted plaintiff to amend his complaint by adding allegations in this behalf, and denied the motion for a nonsuit. A demurrer to the complaint as amended was overruled, and the original answer was allowed to stand as an answer to the complaint as amended. A continuance asked for by defendant in view of the amendment was refused, but the court expressly stated to defendant's counsel that, if it was made to appear that a continuance was necessary to enable defendant to obtain the attendance of witnesses to meet the allegations thus added to the complaint, a continuance would be granted.

There was no error on the part of the court as to any of these matters. The cause of action was in no way changed by the amendment. The action was one for damages for a personal injury suffered because of the negligence of defendant. There was a variance between the allegations and the proof as to what the negligence of the defendant was in the matter. Instead of being his failure to provide a safe and suitable place for plaintiff to work in, it was his negligence in the matter of detaching the end of the steel rod and allowing it to fall upon plaintiff in the place where he was working, for, under the act to which we have referred, Thompson's negligence was his negligence. The trial court had the right to order the complaint to be amended upon such terms as might be just. Section 469, Code Civ. Proc.

[3] Of course defendant was entitled to meet the new allegations by demurrer and answer, which he did, and also to any time reasonably necessary to enable him to obtain available evidence material to the issue of Thompson's negligence. No showing of the necessity for any continuance was attempted to be made, although the trial judge expressly stated that the continuance would be granted, if such a showing were made. It is to be borne in mind that defendant had alleged in his answer as a defense substantially the matters set up by the amendment. It is not suggested even now that defendant was not able to procure or did not procure and introduce all the evidence that he desired to introduce on this issue.

[4] 2. It does not appear to be disputed in appellant's brief that the evidence introduced by plaintiff was sufficient to support a conclusion that Thompson was negligent in the matter of detaching the end of the steel rod. We are of the opinion that it was sufficient for this purpose. It is urged, however, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in that, by the exercise of reasonable care for his own safety, he would have perceived the danger of his situation and guarded himself from injury. We are of the opinion that the conclusion of the trial court that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence at all is fully sustained by the evidence. Apparently he had no reason whatever to imagine that any workman above him would negligently allow a substance capable of injuring him to fall upon him. He had the right to assume that the workmen above would exercise reasonable care for the safety of those below from injury at their hands. It did not follow from the fact that Thompson was engaged in sawing off the ends of these steel rods that he would allow the portion detached to fall to the ground, and plaintiff had no notice or means of notice of any threatened danger.

[5, 6] 3. On the examination of plaintiff, he was asked by his counsel as follows:

> "I will ask you if you have any support otherwise, for yourself and those dependent upon you, than your daily labor?"

This was objected to, and plaintiff's counsel explained his question as follows:

> "I ask if he had any other means of revenue by which he could support himself and family other than that of his daily labor."

The objection was overruled, and the witness answered: "No, sir." The trial judge expressed the view, in regard to another question of somewhat like nature immediately following this, that the testimony was competent for the purpose of showing that he did not have some other occupation that he might follow if his shoulder was lame. This appears to have been the sole reason of the judge in admitting such evidence. He had just previously sustained objections to such questions as, "How large is your family?" and "Have you any children residing with you in San Diego?" We think the objection to the question above set forth should have been sustained. It had no bearing on the matter suggested by the judge and was irrelevant and immaterial to any issue in the case. But we think it is manifest from the record that the trial judge did not consider the financial condition of plaintiff or the obligation of support of others incumbent on him as matters to be considered in fixing the amount of damage. It is to be borne in mind that the action was tried by the court without a jury. The cases cited by appellant are cases in which the jury was substantially instructed by the court that it could consider the financial condition of the plaintiff as an element in determining the amount of damages. We cannot conceive that any injury resulted to defendant by reason of the admission of this evidence, and must hold that the error was without prejudice.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

GALE v. TUOLUMNE COUNTY WATER CO. (Sac. 2232.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1914.)

1. Contempt (§ 66*) — Judgment of Contempt—Appealability.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1222, declaring that judgments and orders of the court or judge made in cases of contempt are final, a judgment adjudging one guilty of contempt for violating a perpetual injunction is not reviewable by appeal, though the court acted without jurisdiction.

2. Judgment (§ 678*) — Conclusiveness — Parties Bound—Successors in Interest.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, providing that a judgment is conclusive between the parties and their successors in interest by title subsequent to the judgment, a successor in interest of the original defendant in a suit involving water rights is bound by the judgment rendered prior to the transfer of the interest.

3. Courts (§ 52*)—Jurisdiction—Establishment of Superior Courts.

Under Const. art. 22, § 3, abolishing district courts and providing for the transfer of records, books, papers, and proceedings to the superior courts created, and declaring that the superior courts shall have the same power and jurisdiction over them as if they had been in the first instance commenced, filed, or lodged therein, a violation in 1914 of a perpetual injunction granted by the district court in 1870 is a contempt of the superior court.

4. Contempt (§ 43*)—Violation of Injunction — Proceedings — Party Entitled to Initiate.

One who acquires property of a plaintiff who has obtained a judgment establishing water rights thereby acquires the rights established by the judgment, and may initiate contempt proceedings for a violation of a perpetual injunction.

5. Contempt (§ 66*)—Violation of Perpetual Injunction—Appealability of Judgment—Constitutional Provisions—"Independent Proceeding"—"Case in Equity."

A contempt proceeding, though arising in a case in equity based on a violation of a perpetual injunction, is an "independent proceeding," and is not a "case in equity," within Const. art. 6, § 4, providing for an appeal in all cases in equity.

6. Contempt (§ 66*)—Judgment — Appealability—Statutory Provisions.

Code Civ. Proc. § 963, providing for an appeal from a special order after final judgment, is general, and is controlled by section 1222, providing that judgments and orders in contempt cases are final, and does not authorize an appeal from a judgment of contempt for a violation of an injunction.

8. Contempt (§ 66*) — Appeal — Statutory Provisions—Validity.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1222, making judgments in contempt cases final, construed to deny a right of appeal in cases of constructive contempt, is not unconstitutional, for the Constitution does not expressly or impliedly give a right of appeal in such cases.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Proceedings by Anna A. Freitas, as successor to O. P. Gale, for the punishment of the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company as successor to Tuolumne County Water Company, for contempt of court for violating an injunction. From a judgment adjudging defendant guilty of contempt, it appeals. Dismissed.

Chickering & Gregory and Donald Y. Lamont, all of San Francisco, for appellant. J. P. O'Brien, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, C. J. Motion to dismiss appeal from judgment adjudging appellant guilty of contempt.

In February, 1870, O. P. Gale, the owner of a certain water ditch and water rights in Tuolumne county, commenced an action in the district court of the Fifth judicial district of this state in and for the county of Tuolumne, against the Tuolumne County Water Company (hereinafter called the "Water Company") to enjoin the company from diverting waters from Mormon creek. In September, 1870, a judgment in favor of plaintiff was entered in the district court, by the terms of which the defendant and its agents, employés, and servants were perpetually "enjoined, inhibited, and restrained from interfering with the natural waters of Mormon creek and its tributaries above the head of plaintiff's ditch, so as to prevent said water from coming to the head of plaintiff's ditch, unless defendant turned out to plaintiff an amount of water equivalent to the natural water of said Mormon creek." On appeal the judgment was affirmed. Subsequently Anna A. Freitas acquired from Gale his ditch and water rights involved in the action, and the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company (hereinafter called the "Power Company") succeeded to all of the property rights and business of the water company. The defendant at the time the action was commenced and determined was engaged in collecting waters in the vicinity of Mormon creek and selling the same, and using said creek and its tributaries and the waters thereof in the conduct of its business.

On September 26, 1913, Anna A. Freitas filed in the superior court of Tuolumne county her affidavit, in which she alleged that the power company had, at divers times in 1912 and 1913, "wrongfully violated the terms, conditions, and provisions of said judgment and decree and perpetual injunction, with the intent then and there to violate the same, etc.," by diverting the waters of Mormon creek and its tributaries. She also alleged that she had suffered great and irreparable injury by the diversion of the waters to which she was entitled, to her damage in the sum of $5,000. Upon her affidavit an order was issued and served upon the power company, requiring it to show cause why it should not be punished for contempt for violating the injunction. On the hearing of the order to show cause, the charging affidavit was amended in some respects; the most important amendment being that at all times in 1912 and 1913 the power company "had notice of and was bound by said judgment and decree and perpetual injunction."

In its answer to the amended affidavit the power company did not deny this allegation, but denied that it had in any manner violated the injunction, and also denied that Anna A. Freitas had suffered any injury or damage. On the hearing of the order to show cause, oral and documentary evidence was introduced. Upon the conclusion of the hearing the court adjudged that the power company had at divers times in August and September, 1913, "willfully and intentionally disobeyed and violated the terms, provisions, and mandates of the judgment and decree and perpetual injunction made, given, and entered in said district court on September 15, 1870, as aforesaid, and that by reason thereof the said Sierra & San Francisco Power Company, a corporation, is guilty of contempt of the authority of said district court and of this court, the successor thereof, as charged." As punishment for its contempt the court fined the power company $500. It appears from the evidence and judgment in the contempt proceeding that the Springfield Tunnel & Development Company (hereinafter called the "Springfield Company") carried on mining operations in close proximity to Mormon creek, at a point above the head of the Freitas ditch; that in its operations it sunk shafts, ran tunnels, and made other underground workings and excavations, which extended below the bed of Mormon creek and its tributaries. The judgment of contempt recites:

> "That during the month of August and the first ten days of the month of September, 1913, the said underground workings and excavations tapped the natural waters of Mormon creek and its tributaries and diverted them into the underground workings of the said mining properties operated by the said Springfield Tunnel & Development Company. That the said company pumped the said waters to the surface of its said property, and during the month of August, 1913, and the first ten days of September, 1913, delivered a substantial part thereof to the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company, who received the same through its weir situate upon Mormon creek, and the said Sierra & San Francisco Power Company, during said time, conveyed the same through its ditches in Mormon creek, and appropriated the water so received to its own use. That the waters so pumped by the Springfield Tunnel & Development Company from its mining property, and the portion thereof delivered to, and received by, the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company, as aforesaid, were a portion of the natural waters of Mormon creek and its tributaries, and the same were wrongfully and in violation of the terms and provisions of said judgment and decree, and perpetual injunction, appropriated by the said Sierra & San Francisco Power Company to its own use."

[1] From the judgment of contempt the power company has attempted to appeal to this court. We say attempted to appeal, because no appeal lies from the judgment. "The judgments and orders of the court or judge made in cases of contempt, are final and conclusive." Section 1222, Code Civ. Proc. Necessarily a judgment, which by the Code is made final and conclusive, is not appealable. This court has repeatedly held that by reason of its finality and conclusiveness the judgment in a contempt case is not appealable. Tyler v. Connolly, 65 Cal. 28, 2 Pac. 414; In re Vance, 88 Cal. 262, 26 Pac. 101; People v. Kuhlman, 118 Cal. 140, 50 Pac. 382; Estate of Wittmeier, 118 Cal. 255, 50 Pac. 393. An appeal does not lie from such a judgment, even though it appear that the court adjudging one guilty of contempt has acted without jurisdiction. The party aggrieved in such a case must resort to other remedies. People v. Kuhlman, supra.

[2, 3] The power company, successor in interest of the original defendant water company, was bound by the judgment rendered in 1870, and to the same extent as was the water company before the latter transferred its property. Section 1908, Code Civ. Proc. The Constitution of 1879 abolished the district courts, but in so doing it provided for the transfer on the 1st of January, 1880, to their successors—the superior courts—of all records, books, papers, and proceedings of the district courts and gave the superior courts "the same power and jurisdiction over them as if they had been in the first instance commenced, filed, or lodged therein." Const. art. 22, § 3. Therefore a violation in 1914 of the perpetual injunction granted by the district court in 1870 constituted contempt of the superior court of Tuolumne county.

[4] Anna A. Freitas, having acquired from the original plaintiff the properties, the subject of dispute in the case of Gale v. The Water Co., became entitled to all the benefits which Gale acquired under the judgment of the district court, and she had the same right to initiate contempt proceedings which Gale would have had if he had never disposed of his properties. The power company being bound by the judgment and injunction, as the successor of the water company, its violation of the injunction, with notice thereof, constituted contempt of court. Lake v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 192, 131 Pac. 371; Ahlers v. Thomas, 24 Nev. 407, 56 Pac. 93, 77 Am. St. Rep. 820; Merriam Co. v. Saalfield, 190 Fed. 927, 111 C. C. A. 517.

[5] The power company claims that, inasmuch as the action of Gale v. Water Company was a case in equity, it has a right of appeal by virtue of section 4, art. 6, of the Constitution, which provides for an appeal from the superior court to the Supreme Court "in all cases in equity except such as arise in justices' courts." A sufficient answer to this contention, in addition to the authority of the cases cited supra, is that a contempt proceeding, though it may arise in a case in equity, is an independent proceeding between the contemner and the court, criminal or quasi criminal in its nature, and is not itself a "case in equity."

[6] To sustain its appeal, the power company further claims that, as the judgment adjudging it guilty of contempt was made after final judgment in the case of Gale v. Water Company, it has the right of appeal therefrom under section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an appeal lies "from any special order made after final judgment"; but, as this provision is general in character, it is controlled by the special law contained in section 1222, Code of Civil Procedure, which makes a judgment of contempt final and conclusive and therefore nonappealable.

[7] Appellant asserts that section 1222, Code of Civil Procedure, making judgments and orders in cases of contempt final and conclusive, does not apply to constructive contempts. For certain purposes the law recognizes a difference between a direct contempt, or that committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, and constructive contempt, or that committed elsewhere. But our Code makes no distinction whatever as far as the right of appeal in either case is concerned, and we can make none.

[8] Appellant further claims that section 1222, Code of Civil Procedure, if applicable to cases of constructive contempt, is unconstitutional. The right of appeal is derived from our Constitution or statutes. The Constitution nowhere, expressly or impliedly, gives a right of appeal in cases of contempt. Therefore section 1222 cannot be unconstitutional.

[9] The main contention of the power company is that in the contempt proceeding "there was a distinct question of title both heard and determined; that this injunction has either taken the form of an order made after final judgment, and is therefore appealable, or it is in itself a judgment, which is also appealable." The appellant is in error in claiming that the judgment of contempt determined title. The judgment against the defendant is nothing more nor less than one adjudging it guilty of contempt of court. Title to the waters which it diverted was determined by the district court, in the case of Gale v. Water Company, to be in Gale. The same title was in his successor in interest at the time of the wrongful diversion. By reason of the judgment of the district court, concluding alike the defendant and its successors in interest, the lower court was bound to recognize the title of Anna A. Freitas to the waters of Mormon creek and its tributaries. No question of title to these waters was raised in the contempt proceeding, and none was determined. If the original defendant water company, after the judgment rendered against it by the district court, had by underground workings and excavations under the bed of Mormon creek and its tributaries tapped the waters thereof and wrongfully diverted the same to its own use, it would have been guilty of contempt, as much so as if the diversion had taken place on the surface. If the original defendant, instead of directly appropriating the waters in question, had obtained them through the Springfield Company, or some other agency which had diverted the waters by underground methods or surface connections, it likewise would have been guilty of contempt of court. As the power company occupies in relation to the case the same position exactly that the water company would have occupied if it had not transferred its properties, the power company was guilty of contempt if directly or indirectly, by underground methods or otherwise, it wrongfully diverted the waters of Mormon creek and its tributaries, title to which waters was in Anna A. Freitas. The issue before the lower court was: Did the power company take waters from Mormon creek and its tributaries in violation of the injunction granted by the district court? That issue was decided adversely to the appellant. The lower court may have been egregiously mistaken in its judgment, but, whether mistaken or not, its judgment must stand. It cannot be reviewed on appeal or otherwise.

It follows that the attempted appeal taken by the Sierra & San Francisco Power Company from the judgment of the superior court of Tuolumne county adjudging it guilty of contempt must be, and the same is hereby, dismissed.

1. Evidence (§ 556*)—Examination of Experts—Medical Authorities.

Where a physician stated on cross-examination that he based an opinion partly on experience, without stating that he relied on any medical authority, the cross-examining party, desiring to know what medical authority, if any, he relied on, should ask him directly on that point, and not erroneously assume that he relied on medical authority, as indicated by the question, "What authority do you rely on in regard to that?" and the sustaining of an objection thereto was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2377; Dec. Dig. § 556.*]

2. Trial (§ 236*) — Instructions — Weight and Credibility of Evidence.

A requested charge by defendant that, in determining the weight and credibility of the evidence of a party to the contest, the jury may consider his interest in the result of the verdict, was properly refused, because intended to particularly caution the jury, based on plaintiff's interest in the result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 531–533; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

3. Damages (§ 132*)—Personal Injuries—Excessive Damages.

A person 54 years old, in good health, received an injury causing a fracture of the base of the skull, accompanied by concussion of the brain and hemorrhage, producing permanent traumatic diabetes, and impairing his hearing and eyesight. His left knee was injured; the ligaments holding the kneecap being torn entirely across. He also received injury to the spinal column and displacement of several of the vertebræ. The injury to the knee caused a permanent displacement of the kneecap, so as to make it impossible for him to walk without the use of crutches or a cane, and then only with care and constant liability to danger of the kneejoint slipping out. The injury to the spine produced physical sexual inability. Held, that a verdict for $10,000 would not be disturbed as excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 372–385, 396; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

4. Appeal and Error (§ 1004*)—Effect of Verdict—Excessive Damages.

It is the province of the jury to determine the damages for a personal injury, subject, if excessive, to the control of the trial court, and a verdict approved by that court will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it is wholly disproportionate to the injuries received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3944–3947; Dec. Dig. § 1004.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by C. K. Douglas against the Berlin Dye Works & Laundry Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hickcox & Crenshaw, of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in a collision on a public thoroughfare between an automobile in which he was riding and an automobile delivery wagon operated by defendant; the claim being that the accident occurred through the negligence of the latter. Plaintiff had a verdict and judgment thereon for $10,000. A motion for a new trial was denied and defendant appeals from the order of denial and the judgment.

On the trial of the action defendant admitted that its negligence, as charged, caused the injury to plaintiff, and its liability therefor; the only issue presented to the jury being as to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff.

At the time of the accident plaintiff was 54 years of age, in good health, free from mental or physical trouble. In the head-on collision between the vehicles he was thrown violently to the ground. As the result thereof, aside from cuts and bruises about his face and body, there was a fracture of the base of the skull, accompanied by concussion of the brain and hemorrhage from the ear and nose; his left knee was injured, a deep gash being cut in it and the ligament that held the cap of the knee to the large bone had been torn entirely across; there was also injury to his spinal column and displacement of several of the vertebræ. The evidence shows that the plaintiff became affected with permanent traumatic diabetes as a result of the injury at the base of his brain, and that his hearing and vision had become permanently and seriously impaired therefrom; that the injury to the ligament at the kneejoint occasioned a permanent displacement of the kneecap, so as to make it impossible for plaintiff to walk without the use of crutches or a cane, and then only with great care and caution and constant liability to danger of the kneejoint slipping out; and that the injury to the spine had produced physical sexual inability in the plaintiff. In addition to these particular results of the injury, and aside from the great pain and suffering which resulted therefrom, there was a general impairment of the mental and physical condition of plaintiff. His nervous condition has become very low; there has been a failure of memory; and he still suffers, and will continue to suffer, from the injuries inflicted on him.

Appellant bases its right to a reversal upon three grounds only: That the court erred in sustaining an objection of plaintiff to an inquiry made by defendant on cross-examination of one of the witnesses produced by the plaintiff; that it erred in refusing to give an instruction to the jury requested by defendant; and it is further claimed that the verdict of the jury is excessive in the award of damages.

As to the first point: Dr. H. M. Coulter, the attending physician of the plaintiff, in the course of his direct examination, testified that plaintiff was permanently affected with traumatic diabetes, which, in his opinion, was the result of the fracture of the base of the skull received in the accident. As a final question on cross-examination of the doctor by the attorney for defendant, the following took place:

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "Q. Isn't from 50 to 60 the most common period of life, that the percentage of diabetes among people of that age is much greater than at any other period of life? A. I should say from 30 to 50, partly from my own experience. Q. What authority do you rely on in regard to that?
> "Mr. Drake (Attorney for Plaintiff): I object to that, as it is not cross-examination. He does not claim to base it on anything but his experience.
>
> "Mr. Hickcox (Attorney for Defendant): He has testified as to his professional—
> "Mr. Drake. He has made the statement that it was from 30 to 50, on his experience.
> "Mr. Hickcox. He said he based his statement on Keene and Osler.
> "The Court. Sustained."

[1] It is claimed by counsel for appellant that it was error on the part of the court not to permit an answer to the question above quoted. It is insisted that when an expert, called on behalf of one of the parties, gives his opinion on a scientific question, opposing counsel have a right on cross-examination to inquire upon what the opinion of the expert is based, whether upon his own experience, or upon accredited authorities of his profession, or both; so that, if the witness asserts that his opinion is based on standard authorities, counsel may, if such authorities relied on do not sustain his claim, show that fact to the jury for the purpose of discrediting his opinion or statement on the subject. As a legal proposition, this may be conceded. Rogers on Expert Testimony (2d Ed.) § 37; Gallagher v. Market St. Ry. Co., 67 Cal. 17, 6 Pac. 869, 51 Am. Rep. 680, note. But we hardly think that there was either such a clear violation of the rule or a denial of a substantial right of appellant thereby in sustaining the objection to the inquiry as would warrant this court in reversing the cause for such alleged error, the only one claimed to have occurred on the trial, where a considerable number of witnesses testified. At most, what appellant insists it had a right to do was to find out whether, in fact, the witness relied on any medical authority in support of his opinion, with a possible chance that, if he did so rely, an examination of the authority referred to might show that it did not agree with him. But, strictly speaking, there was no error committed by the court in its ruling. Counsel for appellant asserted his right to ask the question not upon any suggestion of the rule, but upon the assumption that the witness had "based his statement on Keene and Osler"—medical authorities, we assume. If he had so testified, then the question had already been answered. As matter of fact, however, the witness had not testified that he based his opinion on such authority or any authorities at all. All he said was he based it "partly upon my own experience." It is evident from what was said in discussing the objection to the question that this part of the answer had escaped the attention of the attorneys on both sides and the court. Counsel for respondent and the court were of the opinion that the witness had testified that he based his opinion on his own experience, and counsel for appellant was of the impression that he had mentioned certain authorities. All of them were mistaken in the matter. In this situation of misunderstanding there was nothing to prevent appellant from asking the witness directly whether he relied on any medical authority in support of his opinion, which was the proper inquiry to have made, instead of erroneously assuming, as his inquiry did, that the witness had testified to that effect.

[2] The next complaint of appellant is the refusal of the court to give an instruction to the jury asked by defendant as follows:

> "In determining the weight and credibility of the evidence of a party to the contest, you may take into consideration his interest in the result of the verdict."

Coming from the appellant, and as is evident from its phraseology, this instruction was intended to particularly caution the jury as to its consideration of the evidence of the plaintiff because of "his interest in the result of the verdict." An instruction of this character has been so often condemned that there is no necessity of discussing it. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 231, 74 Pac. 744; People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 Pac. 187; People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 364, 92 Pac. 853; Dow v. City of Oroville, 22 Cal. App. 215, 134 Pac. 197.

[3, 4] As to the last claim of appellant that the verdict is excessive: We have set forth in main the mental and physical results to plaintiff consequent on the injuries he had sustained. It was the province of the jury to determine the amount that he should receive as compensation therefor, subject, if it was excessive, to consideration and control by the trial court. That court on the motion for a new trial made before it, in which this same ground was urged, has approved the verdict. Under these circumstances we could not disturb it, unless it appear that it was wholly disproportionate to the injuries received by the plaintiff, and this we cannot say.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BUNDY. (Cr. 1860.)

1. Criminal Law (§§ 1023, 1134*) — Order Denying Motion in Arrest of Judgment —Review.

An order denying a motion in arrest of judgment is not directly appealable, but is reviewable on appeal from the judgment.

2. Criminal Law (§ 331*)—Insanity—Evidence.

Accused, relying on insanity, must show that he was deranged mentally when committing the criminal act, and that he was not conscious of its wrongful nature, and did not know that it was criminal; but if he has reasoning capacity sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act, if he has knowledge and consciousness that what he is doing is wrong and criminal and will subject him to punishment, he is responsible for his act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 742–744; Dec. Dig. § 331.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 769*)—Instructions—Giving Requested Instructions.

Omission to state which instructions are given at the request of the prosecution, and which at the request of accused, is not blameworthy, but commendable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1803–1806; Dec. Dig. § 769.*]

4. Criminal Law (§ 773*) — Instructions — Misleading Instructions.

An instruction, which states that while the defense of insanity must be weighed fairly, and when established commends itself to the sense of humanity, yet the jury must examine it with care, lest a counterfeit of mental infirmity may furnish immunity to guilt, given before requested instructions of accused on the subject, is not objectionable as nullifying the effect of accused's instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1821–1828; Dec. Dig. § 773.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 311*)—Insanity—Evidence—Absence of Apparent Motive.

The jury may not safely infer the existence of an irresistible influence controlling accused solely from lack of apparent motive for the crime charged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 742–744; Dec. Dig. § 311.*]

6. Homicide (§ 340*)—Evidence—Instructions—Harmless Error.

Where accused admitted that he killed decedent because he was afraid that decedent would inform against him for robbing him, an instruction, that the jury could not safely infer the existence of an irresistible influence of a homicidal tendency from lack of apparent motive alone, was not prejudicial, though it might have been omitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715–717, 720; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

7. Witnesses (§ 305*)—Compelling Accused to Testify—Waiver of Privilege.

The provision of Const. art. 1, § 13, that no person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in any criminal case, does not prevent accused from voluntarily disclosing facts implicating him, and the prosecution may then prove his statements and admissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1053–1057; Dec. Dig. § 305.*]

8. Witnesses (§ 305*)—Compelling Accused to Testify—Waiver of Privilege.

Where physicians examined accused to determine his sanity, and he made no objections thereto, but conversed freely with them, and no fraud was perpetrated by any one, the disclosures made by him were not within Const. art. 1, § 13, declaring that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, though his counsel were not notified of the proposed examination and had no knowledge thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1053–1057; Dec. Dig. § 305.*]

9. Homicide (§ 347*)—Punishment—Review—Modification of Sentence.

The Supreme Court may not set aside or modify a judgment imposing the death penalty for murder in the first degree, merely on the ground that accused at the time of the homicide was not 18 years of age.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 725; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Louis Bundy was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from an order denying a motion in arrest, and from the judgment of conviction, he appeals. Appeal from order dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Earl Rogers and Frank E. Dominguez, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree and adjudged to suffer death. He appeals from the judgment, and also from orders denying his motion for a new trial and his motion in arrest of judgment.

[1] As we have often pointed out, no appeal lies from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment, but the order may be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment. It is not claimed that the order was erroneous in this case, and manifestly the motion was entirely without merit.

[2] It is not claimed that the evidence was in any way insufficient to warrant the verdict that was rendered, and in view of the facts shown by the record no such claim could reasonably be made. Unless defendant was insane at the time he killed Harold Ziesche, which admittedly he did, he was clearly and indisputably guilty of murder in the first degree. The defense interposed was insanity. The evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict on this issue. It is to be remembered that, in order that insanity may be available as a defense, it must appear that the defendant was so deranged mentally when the act with which he is charged was done by him that he was not conscious of the wrongful nature of the act and did not know that it was wrong and criminal. As said by the trial judge in his instructions to the jury:

> "If he has reasoning capacity sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act he is doing, knowledge and consciousness that what he is doing is wrong and criminal and will subject him to punishment, he must be held responsible for his conduct."

[3] Certain suggestions were made on the oral argument as to the instructions given by the trial judge to the jury. We find nothing therein that would warrant a reversal. The omission of the judge to state which instructions were given at the request of the prosecution and which at the request of the defendant was commendable, rather than blameworthy. No reason appears to us why the jury should be told which of the parties requested a requested instruction given by the court, or that it was requested by either party.

[4] The judge gave certain instructions cautioning the jury substantially that while the defense of insanity was to be weighed fully, fairly, and justly, and when satisfactorily established is one that must commend itself to the sense of humanity and justice of the jury, they must examine it with great care, lest an ingenious counterfeit of this mental infirmity shall furnish immunity to guilt. It is admitted that no instruction was given in this connection that would warrant a reversal, in view of previous decisions of this court; but it is suggested that the giving of such cautionary instructions prior to the giving of any of defendant's instructions on insanity "practically nullifies the effect of defendant's instructions." We see no force whatever in this claim. The instructions given in regard to what the court called "moral insanity" were correct, and the evidence was such as to make the giving of these instructions advisable and proper. The same is true as to the instructions as to "partial insanity." There was no conflict in the instructions given upon this subject.

[5, 6] The instruction upon the subject of lack of apparent motive and the supposed claim of defendant's counsel, based thereon, that defendant must have been acting under a powerful and irresistible influence of homicidal tendency, was not happily worded in all respects, and probably should not have been given at all. But we are unable to see that any prejudice could have been caused defendant by the giving of this instruction. The jury could not reasonably have understood this instruction otherwise than as telling them substantially that they could not safely infer the existence of such an influence from the lack of apparent motive alone, which is entirely true. A reading of the evidence on the trial discloses no case of lack of apparent motive. According to his own admissions made before the trial, defendant killed young Ziesche, because, having just violently assaulted and robbed him, he was afraid that Ziesche would inform against him. As we have said, the instruction might well have been omitted, but it was not prejudicial.

[7, 8] The ground mainly urged for reversal is that the trial court improperly allowed two doctors called as witnesses by the district attorney to give their opinions on the question of defendant's sanity. The opinion of each of these witnesses, who were sufficiently shown to be experts on the subject, was based upon examinations, both physical and mental, of the defendant by the witness. Dr. Reynolds examined him twice and Dr. Orbison once. Dr. Reynolds' second examination was had three days before he testified, and Dr. Orbison's two days before the trial commenced. At the time of the second examination by Dr. Reynolds and the examination by Dr. Orbison, defendant had counsel, and they were not notified that any examination was to be had and had no knowledge thereof. Defendant was in custody, confined in the county jail, where the examinations were had. He was informed by Dr. Orbison prior to his examination that he (Orbison) was employed by the district attorney to make an examination. Dr. Reynolds had first examined him the day after his arrest, and when asked by the doctor if he objected to being examined, said, "No, sir." Dr. Reynolds examined him very thoroughly on this occasion, and on the second examination simply made a few tests, tested his sense of smell, his sense of taste, and his eyesight. The first examination by Dr. Reynolds was not made at the instance of the authorities, but at the request of a newspaper editor. Defendant made no objection whatever to being examined at any time, and conversed very freely with each of the doctors. The claim of counsel is that, by allowing the doctors to give their opinions based upon their examinations, defendant was compelled to be a witness against himself, in violation of section 13, art. 1, of the Constitution, which provides that "No person shall * * * be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself. * * *" See, also, section 1323, Pen. Code. It may freely be admitted that, in view of this provision, one accused of crime may not be compelled to divulge to another, to be used by that other as basis for his testimony on the trial, facts which he has a right to hold secret. Whether one accused of crime can properly be compelled to submit to an examination by medical experts for the purpose of determining whether or not he is of sound mind is a question that it is not necessary to discuss here. There is nothing in the constitutional provision relied on that prohibits such a person from furnishing evidence against himself if he chooses to do so. He shall not be compelled to do so, but whatever fact he may disclose without force or compulsion of any kind, or whatever testimony he may voluntarily give, is not within the inhibition. Jones on Ev. § 400. No decision brought to our attention holds to the contrary. And with special reference to examinations for the purpose of ascertaining whether an accused is of unsound mind, it is said in 4 Wigmore on Evidence, § 2265, that:

> "The use of the accused's utterances for forming a witness' opinion as to sanity is a dubitable case only when compulsion has been resorted to."

Perhaps utterances induced by fraud might likewise fall within the dubitable cases. In the case at bar an appellate court would certainly not be warranted by the record in holding that any force or compulsion was used, or that the accused did not voluntarily submit to the examinations. There was nothing in the nature of fraud on the part of the medical men, the authorities, or anybody else. The fact that defendant's counsel were not notified of the proposed examinations and had no knowledge thereof in no way affects the question of the admissibility of the evidence complained of. There is nothing in the law that makes notice or knowledge to counsel essential to a voluntary disclosure of facts by an accused person. Nor does the fact that the defendant was only just 18 years of age materially affect the question. For the purpose of a determination of the question whether the trial court erred in the admission of this evidence, that court must be assumed here to have held upon the testimony that no force or compulsion was used and that the defendant voluntarily submitted to the examinations. The testimony was such as to fully support such a conclusion.

[9] A careful examination of the record discloses no reason to doubt that defendant had a fair and impartial trial. No error was committed that can be held to have prejudiced him. Of course, learned counsel for defendant, by his suggestion that the penalty of death should not be inflicted for a crime committed by one who at the time of such commission was not quite 18 years of age, does not mean to intimate that this court has power to set aside or modify the judgment on any such ground. It is needless to say that this court has no such power.

The appeal from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment is dismissed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ALLISON. (Cr. 335.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 13, 1914.)

1. Sodomy (§ 5*) — Indictment — "Carnal Knowledge."

An indictment accusing defendant of the infamous crime against nature, and alleging that he committed the crime on one "Frank B. Love" by "having carnal knowledge of the body of said Frank B. Love," is insufficient to charge the crime against nature, since, if "Frank B. Love" was a female, as the court must assume, it merely charged defendant with sexual intercourse with a female; "carnal knowledge" meaning sexual intercourse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sodomy, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 5.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Carnal Knowledge.]

2. Criminal Law (§ 304*) — Evidence — Judicial Notice.

The court cannot take judicial knowledge of the sex of a person on whom a crime is alleged to have been committed from the name alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 700–717, 2951½; Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

3. Indictment and Information (§ 117*)—Statutory Offenses—Sufficiency of Indictment.

Though an indictment is sufficient where the crime is substantially alleged in the words of the statute or their equivalent, yet, where the facts stated are capable of two constructions, on one of which the facts may be true and not constitute a crime, the indictment is insufficient, and cannot be aided by presumptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 310; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

James F. Allison was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Reversed.

Thomas Rhodes, of San Luis Obispo, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was prosecuted under section 286 of the Penal Code, which provides that:

> "Every person who is guilty of the infamous crime against nature, committed with mankind or with any animal, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than five years."

Defendant appeals from the judgment of conviction and attacks the indictment, to which he interposed a demurrer upon the ground that the facts stated in the indictment did not constitute a public offense, which was overruled. The indictment is as follows:

> "James F. Allison is accused by the grand jury * * * of the infamous crime against nature, committed as follows, to wit: The said James F. Allison * * * did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously commit the infamous crime against nature with and upon one Frank B. Love, by then and there having carnal knowledge of the body of said Frank B. Love. * * *"

[1] Whether Frank B. Love was a male or female person is not made to appear, other than by the statement that defendant had carnal knowledge of the body of said person, an act which could not have occurred save and except upon the theory that Frank B. Love was a female. Carnal knowledge is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary as sexual connection. This definition is approved in Commonwealth v. Squires, 97 Mass. 61, Noble v. State, 22 Ohio St. 541, and Maxey v. State, 66 Ark. 523, 52 S. W. 2, which hold that carnal knowledge is synonymous with and means sexual intercourse. While, therefore, the indictment accuses defendant of committing the infamous crime against nature, it states facts which preclude the idea of the commission of such crime by showing the act of defendant was sexual connection with Frank B. Love. If, therefore, Frank B. Love was a female, which we must assume, since the contrary does not appear, then the defendant is merely charged with having sexual intercourse with a female, which does not constitute a crime.

[2] As said in People v. Carroll, 1 Cal. App. 4, 81 Pac. 681, which is almost identical with the case at bar:

> "We cannot take judicial knowledge of the sex of a party upon whom the crime is alleged to have been committed from the name alone. The name Frank is generally given to males, but it is sometimes given to females."

It follows that the facts stated in the indictment might be true and yet the defendant be innocent of any crime.

[3] While an indictment will be held sufficient where the crime is substantially alleged in the words of the statute, or their equivalent, nevertheless, if the facts stated are capable of two constructions upon one of which the facts might be true and not constitute a crime, then it is insufficient in charging the offense. The indictment cannot be aided by presumption, since all presumptions are in favor of innocence, and if the facts stated may or may not constitute a crime the presumption is that no crime is charged. People v. Terrill, 127 Cal. 99, 59 Pac. 836. As stated, the facts of the case are practically identical with those involved in People v. Carroll, supra, and upon the authority thereof, as well as for the reasons given, we are constrained to hold that the indictment is insufficient, in that it fails to charge defendant with the commission of a public offense.

Since, under our views, the judgment must, for the reasons given, be reversed, it is unnecessary to discuss other alleged errors.

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are reversed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 392*)—DISMISSAL—WAIVER OF GROUND.

Proc. § 940, providing that the appeal may be taken by filing, with the clerk of court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by John E. Colburn against F. B. Parrett, executor of the estate of Rosa Page, deceased. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Motion to dismiss the appeal denied.

Porter, Morgan & Parrot, of Los Angeles, for appellant. W. C. Shelton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. [1] The grounds of the motion as stated in the notice thereof are the insufficiency of the notice of appeal and the fact that appellant failed to file an "adequate bond on appeal" within five days after service of notice thereof. At the hearing of the motion this last ground was not specified as a ground for dismissal; on the contrary, respondent's counsel expressly stated that "there is but one point, and that is the question of the sufficiency of the notice of appeal."

The giving of the undertaking on appeal prescribed in section 940, Code of Civil Procedure, may be waived, and respondent's statement in open court, in connection with the fact that in making the motion the failure to give the undertaking was not specified as ground for dismissal, renders it unnecessary to consider the same.

[2] There are two methods of taking an appeal (Mitchell v. Steamship Co., 154 Cal. 731, 99 Pac. 202): One as prescribed in section 940, Code of Civil Procedure; the other as prescribed in section 941b. The appeal under consideration was had and taken from the judgment and an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial made upon a bill of exceptions duly settled by the trial court; the notice of appeal being as follows: "Notice is hereby given that T. D. Parrett, through his attorneys, Porter, Morgan & Parrot, appeals to the appellate court of the state of California from that order of the superior court denying a motion for a new trial and also from the judgment therein"—signed by attorneys for appellant, which notice was duly served upon the attorney for respondent. Section 940, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that an appeal may be taken "by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered, a notice stating the appeal from the same, * * * and serving a similar notice on the adverse party, or his attorney." Statutes making provisions in aid of appeals should be liberally interpreted, and, thus construed, it was a sufficient notice of appeal as provided in section 940, supra. The appeal does not purport to have been taken pursuant to section 941b; hence it is unnecessary to determine whether or not the notice was sufficient if tested by the provisions of that section.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

PEOPLE v. TRENT. (Cr. 542.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 13, 1914. Rehearing denied by Supreme Court, Jan. 11, 1915.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 543*)—Evidence—Deposition of Prosecuting Witness—Admissibility—Foundation.

That a proper foundation had been laid for the admission in evidence of the deposition of the prosecuting witness taken at the preliminary hearing was within the discretion of the trial court, where the people showed returns of sheriffs of quite a number of counties of the state, including the county which was the last known residence of the witness, in which each sheriff certified that after due search and diligent inquiry the witness had not been found, and where it was further shown that a diligent search had been made for the witness in the county where the crime occurred and where the witness had been staying and had directed his letters sent.

2. Criminal Law (§ 1043*)—Evidence—Objections—Sufficiency.

Objections by accused to the admission in evidence of the deposition of the prosecuting witness taken at the preliminary hearing, on the ground that the proper foundation had not been laid, made during a discussion as to the sufficiency of the preliminary showing as to due diligence in seeking to locate the witness, did not refer directly to the failure to produce the reporter's certificate; and, where the certificate was in court at the trial and could have been produced had specific objection directing attention to its omission been made, accused could not complain of the admission of the deposition without the proper certificate.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Leslie R. Trent, alias James Riley, was convicted of grand larceny, and from a judgment of conviction and from an order denying a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Murphy and Melvin E. Van Dine, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant of grand larceny and from an order denying a new trial. The appellant urges two points upon this appeal, both of which relate to the regularity of the court's action in admitting in evidence the deposition of the prosecuting witness taken upon the preliminary examination and without the presence of which in evidence it is conceded the defendant could not have been convicted of the alleged crime.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that the court erred in admitting the deposition in evidence without having the proper foundation therefor laid in a sufficient showing that the prosecuting witness could not, after due diligence, be found within the state. The people relied for such showing upon returns of the sheriffs of quite a number of counties of the state, including the county which was the last known place of residence of the desired witness, in which these officials each certified that after due search and diligent inquiry, they had been unable to find the witness. It was further shown that a diligent search had been made for the witness in San Francisco, where the crime occurred and where the witness had been staying and had directed his letters sent. We think that the question as to whether these constituted a showing of due diligence lay largely in the discretion of the trial court; and we are unable to say from this record that the court has in any way abused that discretion. People v. Dene, 20 Cal. App. 137, 128 Pac. 339; People v. Lederer, 17 Cal. App. 369, 119 Pac. 949.

[2] The next and final contention of the appellant is that the deposition was improperly admitted in evidence for the reason that the amended record shows that the certificate of the official reporter of the magistrate upon the preliminary examination, who took and transcribed such deposition, was not presented or admitted in evidence, and hence that the proper foundation for the admission of the deposition itself was not laid. Our examination of the record, however, discloses that the objection of defendant's counsel to the introduction of the deposition was couched in the general form, "that the proper foundation had not been laid," without in any way directing the attention of the court or of opposing counsel to the specific defect upon which he now relies. The record further discloses that the foregoing general objection was made during the course of a discussion as to the sufficiency of the preliminary showing as to due diligence in seeking to locate the missing witness, and did not refer directly to the defect in the omission to produce the reporter's certificate, which is now sought to be taken advantage of. It is further disclosed by the amended record that the said certificate of the reporter was in fact in court at the time of the trial, and could easily have been produced and offered had the specific objection directing attention to its omission in evidence been made. Under these circumstances, we think the objection of the defendant to the admission of the deposition without this preliminary proof was too general to be relied on here. People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 383, 77 Pac. 169.

No other error appearing in the record, the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

MINAKER v. SUNSET BUILDING & REAL ESTATE CO. et al. (Civ. 1392.)

1. Specific Performance (§ 114*) — Complaint — Sufficiency — Fairness of Contract.

A complaint for specific performance which sets out a contract whose terms were fair and reasonable, and which states that the purchase price was the fair and reasonable value of the property at the time, satisfies the statutory requirement that a complaint for specific performance shall show that the contract is fair and equitable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–370, 372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. Specific Performance (§ 114*) — Complaint—Sufficiency—Waiver by Vendor.

A complaint for specific performance is not demurrable because it alleged that the vendor waived a requirement for payment upon specific dates, where it appeared that such variations from the contract had been fully executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–370, 372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

3. Pleading (§ 34*)—Presumptions in Aid of Pleading.

Where a complaint for a specific performance alleged that the vendor had duly waived the requirement of the contract for certain payments, it will be presumed on demurrer that the waiver was in writing if a writing was required therefor.

4. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 212*)—Subsequent Purchaser—Right to Payments—Notice.

A subsequent purchaser is not entitled to have the payments, made under a prior contract for the purchase of the land of which he had notice, made to him, unless he definitely notifies the prior purchaser of his purchase and his claim to such payments.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by A. J. Minaker against the Sunset Building & Real Estate Company, Interurban Real Estate Company, and others. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants Interurban Real Estate Company and others appeal. Affirmed.

H. D. Newhouse and Abram M. Marks, both of San Francisco, for appellants. J. W. Henderson and Frank D. Macbeth, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought by A. J. Minaker against the Sunset Building & Real Estate Company, Interurban Real Estate Company, and Hugo D. Newhouse, for the specific performance of a contract alleged and shown to have been entered into between A. J. Minaker and the Sunset Building & Real Estate Company (or that corporation under another name), for the purchase of certain lots, a portion of a larger subdivided tract of land for the sum of $1,075, plaintiff alleging that he had completed and complied with the terms of that contract and that he was entitled to have his contract specifically enforced, not only against the immediate vendor named in that contract, but also against the subsequent incumbents and purchasers, named also as defendants in this action.

[1] The first point made by the appellants is that the complaint is defective in that it does appear sufficiently from the face of the complaint that the contract is a fair and equitable contract, or, in other words, such a contract as a court of equity will enforce. The complaint sets up in hæc verba the contract itself, and further states that the purchase price of the property stipulated in that contract was the fair and reasonable value of the property at the time the contract was made. We think the allegation that the purchase price of the property was fair and reasonable, taken in connection with the terms of the contract and set out fully in the complaint, suffices to satisfy the statute in that respect, and that the first point urged by the appellant is not well taken. Reese Co. v. House, 162 Cal. 740, 124 Pac. 442.

[2, 3] The point is also made upon the demurrer in the briefs of counsel that the allegation in the complaint that a strict compliance with that part of the contract requiring all payments of the purchase price to be made upon certain days and in certain amounts was duly waived by the defendant and the Sunset Building & Real Estate Company would cause a variation in the rule which has just been announced by the court, and that, further, since a contract in writing can only be modified by a contract in writing, the alleged waiver set forth in the complaint would be void. To this there are two answers: First, that it appears from the face of the complaint that whatever change in the contract was made in this respect, whatever variation was accomplished, was a fully executed variation as between the original parties to the contract; but the second and better answer is that upon the face of the complaint it does not appear as to whether the waiver of this particular provision of the contract was or was not in writing, the only allegation being that the terms of the contract in that respect were duly waived by the respective parties thereto. The Supreme Court has held in a number of cases that whenever it is necessary that a contract or modification of a contract should be in writing, and the complaint alleges that the contract or modification of the contract was actually made and entered into between the parties, the presumption will be that the contract or modification was in writing, in the absence of an averment to the contrary.

It is admitted that the contract between the plaintiff and the Sunset Building & Real Estate Company was duly recorded, and that thereafter and while the plaintiff was proceeding to execute the same, the Sunset Building & Real Estate Company made two deeds of trust to certain parties named Newhouse, and later on that Hugo D. Newhouse, one of the defendants, became the purchaser of the property upon the sale thereof under these deeds of trust. The original contracts being recorded, it follows that whatever rights the defendant Newhouse or his successors in interest, the Interurban Real Estate Company, obtained by virtue of those deeds of trust or by virtue of the sale of property thereunder, or the subsequent conveyance to the Interurban Real Estate Company, they took subject to the contract made with the plaintiff, and to their knowledge and notice of said contract, imparted by the fact of its recordation. The plaintiff continued to make payments due under his original contract to his original vendor, the Sunset Building & Real Estate Company; and, with the exception of one payment of $50 made to Newhouse, completed payment of his installments under his contract, and thereupon demanded a deed of the property, which, being refused, he brought this action for specific performance, making all the aforesaid parties defendants to the action.

[4] The appellants contend that the defendant Newhouse, having taken a subsequent deed of trust to the property, and having later become the owner thereof through sale under that deed, was entitled to have the subsequent payments after the date of the latter deed made to himself rather than to the original vendor; and the appellant also contends that the evidence sufficiently shows that the plaintiff Minaker had knowledge of the rights acquired by Newhouse under these deeds of trust, under the deed of grant made in pursuance thereof, and that, having such knowledge, he was not entitled to continue to make his payments to the original vendor. An examination of the record, however, will show that there is a failure of proof on the part of the defendants in this respect, and that the defendant Newhouse does not seem to have brought clearly home to the notice of the plaintiff the fact of his succession to the title of the property and the claim which he now makes that he was entitled to the subsequent payment upon the installments of the purchase price.

We think that the subsequent purchaser of property, with notice of the existence of a previous contract for its sale to the original vendee, before he can claim that the payments which such vendee is to make under his contract should be made to himself, must definitely advise the original vendee of the fact of his ownership of the property and his claim to such payment, and this the defendant Newhouse does not appear from the evidence to have done. We think, therefore, that the original vendee was entitled to continue to make his payments to the Sunset Building & Real Estate Company, his original vendor, and, having done so, he was entitled to demand the specific performance of the contract, not only from the original vendor, but from all those that had succeeded in interest with notice of his contract, and in this respect we think that the point made by the appellant is not well taken—that the plaintiff was not entitled in this action to the specific performance of his contract against the subsequent purchasers with notice of his rights.

Upon the whole, we are satisfied that the evidence of the case sustains the findings of the trial court, and that there is no error in the record justifying the reversal of the case and for these reasons the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Carl A. Westergreen and another against Alice E. C. Beer and another. From a judgment for defendants, rendered on sustaining a demurrer to the amended complaint without leave to amend, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

William F. Herron, of San Francisco, for appellants. Ross & Ross, of San Mateo, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In this action the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiffs' second amended complaint was sustained by the court below without leave to amend. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiffs have appealed.

The grounds of the demurrer were that the complaint did not state a cause of action and that the plaintiffs did not have legal capacity to sue. The action was one to declare a resulting trust in certain real property, and to compel a conveyance to plaintiffs of their alleged respective interests therein, and is founded upon the following alleged facts:

Ida Danielson, the mother of the plaintiffs and of the defendant Alice E. C. Beer, died, leaving an estate consisting of certain real property in the county of San Mateo. She left a will, which was duly admitted to probate, and in accordance with the terms of the will the property which is the subject of the action was distributed share and share alike, to her children, namely, the defendant Alice E. C. Beer, one Lizzie M. Westergreen, and Carl A. and John A. Westergreen, the plaintiffs. Both of the plaintiffs were then minors, and shortly after the decree of distribution was made one Crow, the public administrator of San Mateo county, was appointed their guardian by the superior court. On or about December 1, 1902, Crow, as the guardian of the estates of the said minors, filed in the superior court of San Mateo county a petition for an order of sale of the minors' interests in said property, alleging that a sale was necessary in order to prevent the state and county taxes thereon from becoming delinquent and to prevent the same from being sold for taxes. The petition was granted by the court, and the order of sale made, pursuant to which the interests of the plaintiffs in the property were sold, and at said sale were purchased for the defendant Alice E. C. Beer by her husband, who acted as her agent in the matter, and who afterwards conveyed the property to her by deed of gift. The sale was confirmed by the superior court, and Crow, as the guardian of the plaintiffs, executed a deed to the property to the purchaser. At the time of the sale the plaintiffs were minors, and the defendant Alice E. C. Beer was an adult. The complaint further alleges that at the time of the sale and for some time prior thereto Alice E. C. Beer was occupying and residing upon the property in question.

[1] It is the contention of the plaintiffs that inasmuch as said defendant, their adult sister, was a joint devisee with the plaintiffs, and had acquired her interest in the property under the terms of their mother's will (which left it to the four children, share and share alike), she was therefore a tenant in common with them. This may be conceded; and likewise it may be conceded, as is contended, that the law prohibits a tenant in common from purchasing for his own benefit an outstanding incumbrance upon the common property. The rule of law in this behalf, however, has no application in our opinion to the facts pleaded in the plaintiffs' complaint. The law does not prohibit one cotenant from purchasing the interest of another tenant in common at a judicial sale. In the early case of Gunter v. Laffan, 7 Cal. 589, our Supreme Court said that:

> "Tenants in common, or partners, have a right to acquire their cotenants' or copartners' interests, by purchase under an execution sale; there being nothing in their relations to forbid it."

And in Freeman on Cotenants and Partition, § 165, it is said:

> "The reasons which prevent a cotenant from purchasing and asserting an outstanding title do not apply with equal, and generally not with any, force against his purchasing the title of his cotenants, whether the sale be voluntary or involuntary. Unless some fraud can be shown to have been perpetrated, or some superior knowledge taken advantage of, there is no doubt that a cotenant may purchase at an execution or judicial sale the moiety of any of his companions in interest, and that he may retain and assert the title thereby acquired as fully as though he was a stranger to the judgment defendant."

[2] The sale complained of in the present case was undoubtedly a judicial sale. That a cotenant, irrespective of the origin or mode of creating the cotenancy, is not disqualified from purchasing the interest of any of his cotenants at such a sale is supported by the following authorities: Credle v. Baugham, 152 N. C. 18, 67 S. E. 46, 136 Am. St. Rep. 787; Snell v. Harrison, 104 Mo. 158, 16 S. W. 152; Peck v. Lockridge, 97 Mo. 549, 11 S. W. 246; Hopper v. Hopper, 79 Md. 400, 29 Atl. 611; Starkweather v. Jenner, 216 U. S. 524, 30 Sup. Ct. 382, 54 L. Ed. 602, 17 Ann. Cas. 1167; Gunter v. Laffan, supra.

[3] There is no merit in the contention that Mrs. Beer stood in a fiduciary relation to the plaintiffs because of her blood relationship to them. The mere relationship of sister and brother, standing alone and by itself, does not create a fiduciary relationship. Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555;

Bacon v. Soule, 19 Cal. App. 428, 126 Pac. 384. It will be noted that the complaint does not aver any fraud, undue influence, collusion, inadequacy of consideration, or any other fact tending to show that defendant Alice E. C. Beer took advantage of her situation with reference to the property or her relationship to the plaintiffs.

We are of the opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It is therefore unnecessary for us to decide the question as to whether or not the demurrer is well taken upon the ground that the plaintiffs did not have legal capacity to sue.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 13, 1914.)

1. Burglary (§ 20*)—Indictment—Identification of Building.

An indictment for burglary, charging that defendant did willfully, etc., enter that certain building in the town of G. in which the United States post office was then located, which building was then and there owned by D., etc., sufficiently described the building burglarized.

3. Witnesses (§ 268*)—Cross-Examination—Identity of Coins.

Where an incriminating circumstance in a prosecution for burglary was a smooth quarter found on defendant, defendant's counsel having first shown to a witness on cross-examination another smooth quarter and asked him to point out any differences between the two coins, the court did not err in limiting the cross-examination, as to the witness' ability to identify the coin in question, to testimony as to the means or method whereby he assumed to be able to distinguish the coin from other like coins.

4. Criminal Law (§ 345*)—Evidence—Relevancy.

In a prosecution for burglarizing a post office, accused was not prejudiced by the erroneous admission of evidence of the finding of two five-cent postage stamps on a railroad track near the town where the burglary was committed, without evidence connecting the stamps with accused, where there was other ample evidence to establish defendant's connection with the crime charged.

Defendants having been arrested for burglary after they had alighted from a railroad train, evidence of the deputy sheriff who accomplished the arrest that while standing in the baggage car he opened the door slightly, peeped through into the passenger coach, and "located the two gentlemen that I was looking for," was not objectionable as equivalent to a statement that defendant and his companion had committed the burglary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Henry Warner was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Butts, of Santa Rosa, and Charles Peery, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant and one Joe Malone were jointly charged by an information filed in the superior court of Sonoma county with the crime of burglary. The accused demanded and were given separate trials, and the defendant was convicted of the crime charged. This appeal, supported by a transcript of the testimony duly prepared under section 1247 of the Penal Code, is presented by the defendant from the judgment.

[1] The first point made by the defendant is that the building in which the burglary is alleged to have been committed is not so described in the information as to identify it with that definiteness necessary to the protection of the accused against a second prosecution for the identical offense which it was the intention to charge. The information alleges that the defendants "did willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously enter that certain building in the town of Guerneville, in said county, in which the United States post office was then and there located, and which building was then and there owned by Mrs. R. S. Drake, with felonious intent then and there to commit larceny." We think the building was thus so described in the information as to have fully informed the defendant of the particular building which he was charged with having burglariously entered and to render available a plea of once in jeopardy and former conviction or acquittal in case a second prosecution for the same offense should be inaugurated against him. Indeed, the statement that the building entered was the one in which the United States post office at Guerneville is located would have been a sufficient description, since there is but one post office in said town. But the description goes further by declaring that said building was owned by Mrs. R. S. Drake. The evidence confirms this allegation and further shows that the post office was in the building owned by her. The description was clearly sufficient for all purposes. See People v. Edwards, 59 Cal. 359; People v. Bitancourt, 74 Cal. 188, 190, 15 Pac. 744; People v. Main, 114 Cal. 634, 46 Pac. 612; People v. Parker, 91 Cal. 91, 27 Pac. 537; People v. Price, 143 Cal. 351, 77 Pac. 73.

[2] The next point urged for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict.

The evidence upon which the defendant was convicted was purely circumstantial, and, while it is to be conceded that it does not appear at first blush to be very strong, still, after a careful analysis of the circumstances thus developed, we are persuaded that the conclusion reached by the jury is well supported. The facts, narratively stated, are as follows: Between the hours of 5:35 p. m. of the 20th and 5:25 a. m. of the 21st day of May, 1913, the post office at Guerneville was entered, the safe therein blown open by dynamite, and its contents rifled; there having been taken therefrom $171.07 in cash and $1,151.75 in postage stamps. The money so taken consisted of two or three $20 pieces, a considerable lot of $5 pieces, and a quantity of dimes and nickels. Among this money was a quarter of a dollar which had worn perfectly smooth and which had been in the possession of the postmaster for several weeks prior and up to the time of the burglary. An inspection of the post office premises early on the morning of May 21st, after the postmaster had discovered that the office had been burglarized, revealed the fact that the door of the building had been pried open by means of picks, which had been taken from the toolhouse of the railroad company. The safe was badly shattered from the effect of the concussion. In the post office there was picked up from the floor something over $11 in money, which had evidently been dropped by the burglars, perhaps because of their haste in getting away from the scene of their crime.

It appears that the defendant and Malone, his codefendant, were first seen in the neighborhood of Guerneville on the 18th day of May, 1913—two or three days previously to the commission of the crime. On that day they ate dinner at a hotel at Occidental, a small town situated several miles from Guerneville. By various persons they were thereafter seen either at Guerneville or at points near that town both before and on the day that the building was entered. On the morning of the 20th of May, at about the hour of 10 o'clock, they were seen lying under a tree on the roadside near a place called Rio Nido, which place is located about a mile from Guerneville. At 12 o'clock noon of the 20th of May they were seen sitting in front of one of the places of business at Guerneville about a block distant from the post office. At about 15 minutes to 6 o'clock of the morning of the 21st day of May, the defendant and his companion appeared at the hotel at Occidental and there and at that time had breakfast. At about 6:40 a. m., the conductor on a narrow gauge railroad whose trains carry passengers from Occidental to Sausalito, where the road connects with the boats for San Francisco, saw the defendant and Malone, just as the train was about to move, running from behind the depot at Occidental to catch said train. The two men boarded the train without having first purchased tickets at the depot, paying their fares to Camp Meeker, a station on the line of said road a short distance from Occidental, to the conductor. When the train reached Camp Meeker, both men alighted, one going down the track in the direction in which the train was then going. The other went in the opposite direction. The train remained at Camp Meeker for upwards of 35 minutes and then resumed its journey south. Both the defendant and Malone had boarded the train, the former having purchased a ticket to Fairfax and the latter a ticket to Pacheco, a small flag station, at which, the conductor testified, the train rarely ever stopped or had occasion to stop. On entering the passenger coach, the defendant took the rear seat and Malone a seat in the front part of the car, and thus they traveled until Fairfax was reached. It appears that, the sheriff's office of Marin county having previously been apprised of the burglary by the authorities of Sonoma county, a deputy sheriff of the first-named county boarded the train before it arrived at Fairfax; he having been given information that two persons who were suspected of having perpetrated the crime were aboard of said train. The deputy took a position in the baggage car and, peeping "through the crack of the door," saw the two men seated in the passenger coach, as above indicated. When the train reached the Fairfax depot, the officer, having stepped into the passenger coach just before the train came to a standstill, followed the two men out of the car. Before they got off the car, the defendant, in a whisper, but so that the officer heard it, directed Malone to walk down the track. As Malone started down the track, the defendant started towards the town. Before either had taken many steps in the respective directions in which they had started, the officer halted and proceeded to question them, asking them their names, where they came from, etc. The defendant gave his name as Lawson and at a subsequent interview with the two men Malone declared that his name was Murray.

"I asked them," testified the officer, "where they boarded the train—I asked the gentleman (the defendant) where he boarded the train, and he would not answer me. I asked him the second time, and he pulled a card out of his pocket—that is, a time-table, and was looking over the time-table. He seemed to be quite nervous. Well, he was nervous. He would not answer me at all. I asked him the second time. I says, 'How far are you going?' He says, 'I am going to San Francisco.' I says, 'What made you get off here?' He says, 'You tell me something and I will tell you something'—that is the remark he made. He did not tell me why he got off at Fairfax. * * * That train runs through to connect with the boat for San Francisco—it runs to Sausalito, which is a transfer station to San Francisco."

The officer then placed the two men under arrest and conveyed them to the sheriff's office at San Rafael. There the two men were searched, and from the person of the defendant the sum of $78.70 was taken, and upon that of Malone the sum of $78.60 was found. Among the pieces of coin found on the defendant was a quarter of a dollar which had become perfectly smooth. No postage stamps were found in the possession of either of the two men.

Thus we have detailed all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence purporting to fasten guilt upon the defendant and upon which the jury founded their verdict of conviction. Readily it will be observed that the strongest circumstance developed at the trial against the defendant was the fact of his possession, at the time of his arrest, which occurred within a few hours after the burglary, of the smooth two-bit piece referred to above. Mr. Duncan, the postmaster, having been shown the smooth two-bit piece taken from the defendant, testified, upon an examination of the coin, that it "was the two-bit piece that was in the safe the night of the robbery, after I locked it up. I received it from Mr. Johnson that runs the mercantile store there. He brought it in one morning and asked me if I thought it was good for stamps. I was in a hurry and told him I thought it was." He said that he placed the quarter in the post office receipts till, where he left the stamp money, but that, because it was "so slick," he took occasion to examine it several times while it was in his possession. He observed on the coin a little depression below the right side of the eagle, and from that mark, which was perhaps made in the milling of the piece, he felt satisfied that the coin taken from the defendant was the same smooth two-bit piece which he received from Johnson and which was in the post office safe on the night of the robbery.

C. D. Johnson, from whom the postmaster received, under the circumstances as explained by the latter, a smooth 25-cent piece, testified, in part, as follows:

"Q. Mr. Johnson, I show you a quarter marked People's Exhibit 1 for identification, People v. Warner. Did you ever see that quarter before? A. Yes. Q. When did you first see that? A. Oh, after the 1st of September a year ago * * * in the safe of the Guerneville Rochdale Company. (The witness was connected with said company.) * * * It remained in the safe in a little box until along about January and I took it out. There were four quarters. I took the four of them out and put them in my pocket. * * * Two of them I still have. * * * This particular quarter I gave when I went to the post office. I asked Mr. Duncan (the postmaster) if he would take it for stamps. This occurred in February or March, perhaps February (1913). * * * I had it in my pocket over a month or six weeks. * * * I took the four quarters out (of the safe). Two of the quarters were marked. * * * Two of the coins had no mark on them. * * * This is the coin I turned over to the postmaster for postage stamps."

The witness proceeded to testify that, after the robbery of the post office, the quarter taken from the defendant's possession at the time of his arrest was exhibited to him (witness) by the sheriff of Sonoma county, and that he identified the coin as the one delivered by him to the postmaster. He said he was able to identify the coin from the fact that on its date side it was perfectly smooth, the date and the "Goddess of Liberty" being wholly obliterated, and from the further fact that on the reverse side thereof the eagle, while considerably worn, was plainly visible, and that to the right and under the eagle there was a peculiar depression.

The defendant did not take the stand in his own behalf. One Robert Wall, however, testifying for him, said that he was engaged in the business of selling newspapers at a news stand at the ferry building, in San Francisco; that he was acquainted with the defendant, who had, during the recent Portala festival in San Francisco, worked for the witness; that on the 17th day of May, 1913—about four days prior to the time of the commission of the crime charged—the defendant bought a newspaper from him and in payment therefor handed the witness a $5 gold piece; that he (witness) in returning to the defendant the change gave the latter, among other denominations of coin, a quarter of a dollar which had been so worn that it was perfectly smooth. The witness inspected and examined the quarter taken from the defendant and declared that he was "pretty sure that was the quarter that I gave him at that time."

Thus it is to be noted that a conflict arises in the evidence upon the question whether the "smooth quarter" found in the possession of the accused at the time of his arrest was the one which the postmaster declared was in the safe of the post office. While it may be conceded that the identification of a particular piece of coin is, as a general proposition, an act most difficult of accomplishment, still, in this case, it is made to appear that the particular coin whose identification was singularly vital to the determination of the ultimate issue was so peculiarly marked that in that respect it was plainly different and so removed from the ordinary coins of its denomination that the witnesses for the people, having frequently examined it, could identify it as one which they had seen and handled previously to the time at which it was found in the possession of the accused. It was therefore with no less propriety than as to any other question of fact in the case, with the jury to decide the truth of the controversy and so determine whether the identification of the coin by the witnesses Duncan and Johnson was to be accepted as correct or erroneous or of so doubtful a character as to justify its rejection. The jury evidently accredited the identification of the coin by said witnesses, and thus the fact of the possession by the defendant, so soon after the burglary, of the 25-cent piece in question became and constituted a circumstance which, unexplained, although not of itself sufficient to warrent a conviction, the jury were nevertheless authorized to consider, in connection with the other circumstances, such as they were, in passing upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused. And whether the circumstance of the possession of stolen property has been satisfactorily explained is a question solely for the jury's determination.

The case, then, as to the facts, stands thus: That the defendant and his companion, Malone, strangers in and around the town of Guerneville, were engaged in loitering about that and neighboring places for several days before and on the day of or preceding that on which the burglary was committed; that neither of the men appeared to have any special business, at least of a legitimate nature, in that locality; that early in the morning of the 21st day of May, and within a few hours after the burglary, they, at the town of Occidental, were seen running from behind the depot to catch a train which was about to start; that they boarded said train, without first procuring tickets, paid their fares to the conductor to Camp Meeker, a short distance from Occidental, and then alighted and departed, one going in one direction and the other in the opposite; that they again took that train and occupied seats in the coach far apart from each other, going to Fairfax, where they alighted, the defendant directing his companion to walk on down the track, while he himself started in an opposite direction and towards the business part of said town; that, upon being accosted by the officer and questioned by him as to their names, where they came from, and where they were going, the defendant betrayed nervousness, refused to answer the officer's questions as to the point at which they boarded the train and where they had been, and both gave the officer fictitious names; that the two men each had in his possession approximately the same amount of money; and that in the defendant's possession was a piece of coin which was identified as the one in the safe at the time that it was rifled.

That the circumstances, as thus recapitulated, strongly point to the defendant's guilt, no reasonable person will for a moment deny or even attempt to controvert. And, while the defendant was at liberty to remain mute at the trial and his silence not to be considered against him, yet the fact conspicuously stands out that none of those circumstances was controverted or its incriminatory force impeached or impaired by adverse testimony, except the single circumstance (as to which, as shown, there is some conflict in the testimony) of the finding in the possession of the defendant of a two-bit piece which corresponded in certain respects, unusual to coin, with a piece of money of the same denomination which was shown to have been in the post office safe at the time of the burglary. In the absence of satisfactory or any explanation of those circumstances, the jury were required to answer for themselves, by a consideration of all the circumstances together, these questions: (1) Why did the defendant and his companion conceal themselves behind the depot at Occidental, at an early hour in the morning, and then hastily take the train, as it was about to move, without first providing themselves with tickets in the usual way? (2) Why did they separate when arriving at Camp Meeker and alighting from the train and then again take the same train for Fairfax? (3) Why did they separate themselves in the coach, one taking a seat in the extreme rear of the coach and the other seating himself in the extreme forward end of the car? (4) Why, upon reaching Fairfax, did the defendant request Malone to walk on down the track and he start to go toward the business part of the town? (5) Why did they give assumed or false names to the deputy sheriff? (6) Why, if, as the defendant declared was true, they were bound for San Francisco, did they leave at Fairfax the train on which they were riding and which would have given them direct connection with the ferry boats at Sausalito for San Francisco? (7) Why did they refuse to answer the deputy sheriff when he questioned them as to the place at which they boarded the train and as to where they had been? (8) What was the occasion of the betrayal of nervousness by the defendant when first accosted and questioned by the officer? (9) What was the purpose of the two men in loitering around the neighborhood of Guerneville? Men traveling together as companions may, with perfectly righteous motives, act as the defendant and Malone acted, yet such conduct in men who, as friends, are journeying together over the country, is so peculiar and unusual or so far the reverse of the ordinary demeanor of men traveling together that it is open to very serious suspicion that there is some sinister or questionable motive behind it, and, when viewed by the light of other connected circumstances tending in some measure to fasten guilt of crime upon persons so demeaning themselves, it may well be expected to lead the mind from the grade of mere suspicion to that of conviction that it is actuated by a criminal purpose. And so the jury could with sound reason have viewed, and presumptively did view, the actions of the defendant and his companion as thus shown by the testimony, and, as before declared, we cannot see how a court of review can justly say that their interpretation of all the circumstances, considered together and in connection with each other, as represented by their verdict, is, as a matter of law, erroneous.

It is next contended that numerous prejudicial errors were committed in rulings upon the evidence. Some of these will be noticed.

[3] Counsel for the defendant, having first shown to the witness Duncan another smooth quarter of a dollar than the one found on the defendant, asked him to point out the distinguishing difference, if any, between the two pieces of coin. The obvious purpose of such examination of the witness was to show, if thus it could be done, that there was nothing in the coin taken from the defendant which would enable a person to distinguish it from any other equally smooth two-bit piece. The court interrupted counsel to say that, as far as he could go in the matter of testing the ability of the witness to identify the coin in question was to question, by proper cross-examination, the means or method whereby he assumed to be able to identify or distinguish said coin from any other like coin. The court's course in this regard is assigned as error.

While we think that the court could, without serious legal impropriety, have allowed the witness to compare the two pieces of coin and point out or, as counsel for the defendant undoubtedly expected would be the result, fail to point out, any difference between the two that would facilitate a ready distinction between them, it is clear that, strictly speaking, the ruling was not erroneous, for, after all, the question whether the two-bit piece, the identification of which was of vital importance in this case, was or was not in any respect different from any other smooth quarter of a dollar was one whose solution was for the jury and not for the witness. As a matter of defense, it would have been proper and competent for counsel for the defendant to have put in evidence another or other quarters of the same general appearance as that of the one taken from the defendant and thus have submitted to the determination of the jury the proposition whether the piece of coin found on the defendant could by any means or for any reason be differentiated or distinguished from the ordinary coin of like denomination, worn smooth by use. This course counsel did not adopt.

[4] It is urged that, inasmuch as there was presented no direct evidence of the commission of the burglary by more than one person, it was error for the court to permit a witness to testify that he saw the defendant in the company of Malone at the Monte Rio Hotel on the afternoon of May 20th. The theory of the prosecution was that the crime was committed jointly by the defendant and Malone, and upon that theory the testimony objected to was peculiarly pertinent. But even if the prosecution had proceeded upon the theory that the defendant alone committed the deed, testimony of the fact that, just prior to the burglary, he had been seen near the scene thereof in the company of another party, who was not accused or even suspected of complicity in the commission of the crime, could not possibly prejudice his rights.

[5] It appears that, at about 6 o'clock of the morning of the 21st of May, one Lincoln Stewart, while on his way to his place of employment, found two 5-cent postage stamps on the railroad track between Guerneville and Monte Rio, and a short distance from the former place, and over objection by defendant, Stewart was permitted to testify to the fact of finding said stamps, and objection was also likewise but unavailingly made to the admission of the stamps in evidence. The defendant was not shown to have had any connection with said stamps, and therefore the testimony disclosing the fact that they were found as indicated could have no tendency to establish his guilt. We can conceive of no legal reason justifying the admission of the testimony. We are of the opinion, however, that the other circumstances were, unaided by the circumstance of the finding of the stamps, amply sufficient to generate in the minds of reasonable men the conviction that the defendant was, beyond a reasonable doubt, guilty of the crime charged. In other words, we are convinced that, had the circumstance of the finding of the stamps been eliminated from or not brought into the record, the jury could have justly concluded from the other circumstances that the defendant was guilty. In this view of the record, the testimony objected to cannot well be held to have operated prejudicially against the accused.

[6] The witness Emerald, the deputy sheriff who arrested the defendant and Malone, testified that, upon going into the baggage car, he opened the door thereof slightly, peeped through and into the passenger coach, and "located the two gentlemen that I was looking for." Counsel for the defendant moved to strike out the words "I was looking for," contending that the statement of the witness as phrased by the latter "was equivalent to telling the jury that the defendant and the other man, Malone, had committed the robbery at Guerneville." The court refused to order said words stricken out. The statement could not have been so understood by the jury, since the testimony of the officer did not show that he had such knowledge of the two men or their connection with the crime as would induce the jury to attach any significance to any statement by him which might be so construed as to involve a declaration or the expression of an opinion by him that they were guilty of the charge. His testimony clearly disclosed that all that he knew about the defendant and Malone or their connection with the commission of the crime for which he arrested them was what he might have acquired through his interpretation of their actions or conduct when he placed them under arrest, and it is only reasonable to say that intelligent men would not, in the face of such testimony, pay any attention to what might be viewed, by possible construction, as an opinion of the witness that the accused were the guilty persons.

[7] It is complained that the ruling permitting the deputy sheriff who arrested the defendant to testify that he found, among other articles, a "skeleton key" in the possession of the latter, when arrested, was erroneous and prejudicial. It may perhaps be unnecessary to explain that a "skeleton key" is a burglar's implement and is commonly known to be habitually carried by professional burglars, it being capable of opening door locks to which it had not been specially fitted. The specific objection to this testimony is, however, that, inasmuch as it was quite clearly shown that entrance into the building was effected by the prying open of the door by means of a pick and not by the use of a key, the fact that the defendant had upon his person a skeleton or burglar's key could have no pertinency to any issue in the case. But it appears that counsel for the defendant first opened up the matter objected to by asking the witness, on cross-examination, if he found any burglar's tools of any kind in the possession of the accused. On redirect, the following question was asked by the district attorney: "You said you did not find any burglar's tools. Did you find a burglar key? A. We found a skeleton key." Counsel for the defendant then interposed: "We object to that as leading, 'Did he find a key?' Answer, by witness: 'Yes, a skeleton key.'" Subsequently, and after the question had been answered, counsel for the defendant objected to the testimony upon the ground that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." These objections having been made after the question was answered, there was nothing before the court upon which to predicate a ruling, and therefore no ruling was made. Counsel's remaining remedy was in a motion to strike the testimony from the record, and, having failed to make such a motion, there is no warrant for a review by this court of the error in admitting the testimony, if error it was.

We have now considered herein all the assignments of error in the rulings of the court upon the evidence that we have thought merited special notice. We can see no just reason for interference with the jury's conclusion upon the ultimate question in this case, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MALONE. (Cr. 274.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 13, 1914.)

1. BURGLARY (§ 41*)—EVIDENCE.
In a prosecution for burglary, evidence held to sustain a finding of defendant's complicity in the crime.

2. BURGLARY (§ 36*)—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.
Evidence that defendant when arrested for burglary gave a fictitious name to the officer, that he had in his possession a certain amount of money, which with that found on his codefendant equaled the sum stolen from the building burglarized, that a 25-cent piece found in the codefendant's possession was worn and like one kept by complainant in the office burglarized, together with the moneys taken from both defendant and his codefendant, was relevant and admissible against accused.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 339*)—EVIDENCE—IDENTITY.
In a prosecution for burglary, a sheriff having testified to having taken accused and his codefendant to the store of C. for identification, it was not error for the court to exclude on cross-examination a question intended to show that the persons at such store could not identify them.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 359*)—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.
In a prosecution for burglary, evidence that the sheriff of the county, on first learning of the burglary, entertained a suspicion that another person was the author of the crime, was irrelevant.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—REQUEST TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.
A request to charge that, when all the evidence is before the jury, the burden of proof remains where it started, with the prosecution, was covered by instructions that the state must prove by competent evidence every essential element of the crime charged, to the satisfaction of each and every juror beyond a reasonable doubt, and that the law presumes every man innocent until his guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt, which presumption attaches at every stage of the case and to every fact essential to a conviction.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUEST TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.
A request to charge that if the jury in considering the evidence can reasonably account for any fact in the case on a theory which will admit of defendant's innocence, and if they have a reasonable doubt of his guilt they should acquit, was covered by an instruction given that, when circumstantial evidence is relied on for a conviction, it is not only necessary that the circumstances all concur to show that defend-

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Joe Malone was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Butts, of Santa Rosa, and Charles Peery, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was informed against, jointly with one Henry Warner, by the district attorney of Sonoma county, for the crime of burglary, and, having been convicted of the crime so charged, prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction.

An opinion in the case of the defendant's codefendant, Henry Warner (Crim. No. 273), affirming the judgment therein, was this day handed down by and filed in this court. 145 Pac. 545. As the charge against both Warner and the defendant grew out of precisely the same transaction, the general facts are, of course, the same in both cases, and, having fully stated the facts in the Warner Case, supra, it is not considered necessary to repeat them here.

The defendant in the present case makes the points that the information is fatally defective in that the description of the building alleged to have been burglarized is not sufficiently definite to apprise him of the particular building thus referred to and that the evidence is so wanting in probative power that it is incapable of upholding the verdict. Upon both these points our views are expressed in the Warner Case, supra, and we have discovered no reason for holding them to be any less untenable in this than in that case. We therefore hold, upon the authority of the Warner Case, that the information is not amenable to the criticism to which it was there and is here subjected and that the evidence is amply sufficient to support the verdict in this case.

[1] It is argued in this case, however, that, inasmuch as none of the stolen property was found in the personal possession of Malone, as was true in the case of Warner, the evidence here discloses no circumstance whatever tending to connect the defendant with complicity in the commission of the crime. But the fact that a certain part of the stolen property was found in the possession of Warner, the defendant's alleged companion in the commission of the crime, was shown in this case, and, under all the circumstances developed against both men through the evidence in both cases, that fact, unexplained, constituted a material inculpatory circumstance against Malone. And in this case no attempt was made, as was done in the case of Warner, to explain the latter's possession of certain of the stolen property.

As shown in the opinion in the Warner Case, the two men, when seen at all, were in the company of each other from the time they were first observed in the immediate neighborhood of Guerneville up to and including the time at which they were apprehended by the deputy sheriff of Marin county. Moreover, in addition to that circumstance and the other circumstances detailed in the opinion in the Warner Case, the more or less significant circumstance was developed in this case that Malone carried his money in different parts of his clothing—"some in his coat pocket, some in his pants pocket, and some pinned in his clothes in the band of his trousers," so testified the deputy sheriff who arrested the two men. In brief, all the circumstances, independent of that of the possession by Warner of a smooth two-bit piece, identified as the same piece of coin of that description that was in the safe at the time of the burglary, indicated the guilt of Malone no less than that of Warner, or, in other words, indicated, if anything at all of an incriminatory nature, so far as Malone and Warner were concerned, that the crime was the consummation of their combined or joint action. Therefore, we say, the fact of the finding of a part of the property stolen from the safe by one of the two men, within a few hours after the property was so taken, constituted a relevant and material circumstance against the other, to be accorded, however, such weight in the proof of guilt as the jury might conceive it to be entitled to after comparing and considering it with all the other circumstances in the case.

[2] Complaint is made of the rulings whereby the following testimony was allowed to go to the jury, the defendant having objected to the same on the usual general grounds, claiming as the specific ground of his objections that no showing was made that the burglary was committed by more than one person, viz.: (1) That Warner, when arrested, gave his name as "Lawson" to the officer making the arrest; (2) that the defendant had in his possession a certain amount of money; (3) admitting in evidence the smooth quarter of a dollar found in the possession of Warner and above referred to; (4) admitting in evidence the moneys taken from both the defendant and Warner. But the very purpose of all this testimony was to disclose to the jury circumstances tending to show that the defendant, who had all along been the companion of Warner, was implicated with the latter in the commission of the crime. Clearly, all those circumstances were relevant and competent as against the defendant. Their weight or evidentiary value was, of course, a matter whose determination was solely with the jury.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[3] It appears that, after the arrest of the two men and prior to their trial, the sheriff took them to Guerneville to ascertain whether any of the residents of that place would be able to identify them as persons whose presence at or near said town they had observed shortly anterior to the time at which the crime was committed, and that among the places in Guerneville to which the two men were so taken was the store of a Mr. Cobb. Counsel for the defendant asked the sheriff the following question on cross-examination, "And they could not identify them there at Cobb's?" to which question the court sustained an objection by the district attorney. It is here contended that said ruling was erroneous and prejudicial, but the contention is clearly untenable. Doubtless the sheriff could have brought the men into the presence of many of the residents of Guerneville that had never seen them prior to the time they were so brought before them, but that fact itself would not constitute proof that they were not in Guerneville on the day that the burglary was committed or the day preceding that day. The fact is that the uncontradicted testimony of several witnesses shows that the two men were seen in Guerneville and the immediate neighborhood thereof on the afternoon of the 20th day of May, only a few hours before the crime with which they were charged was perpetrated.

[4] Nor was it error for the court to refuse to allow the defendant to show that the sheriff of Sonoma county, upon learning of the burglary, entertained a suspicion that a character known to him as "Big Otto" was the author of the crime. It is not conceivable that the fact, if it was a fact, that the sheriff suspected some other person than the accused of having committed the crime could shed any light upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant. As independent or substantive proof, such testimony would obviously be incompetent in that it would involve the expression of the mere opinion of the sheriff, and there was nothing testified to by the sheriff in his direct examination which seemed to justify, on cross-examination, inquiry into the question whether he had conceived and entertained such a suspicion.

[5] It is insisted that the court made a mistake to the serious disadvantage of the accused by rejecting the following instruction requested by him:

> "The court instructs you that, when all the evidence in the case is before the jury, the burden of proof remains where it started, with the prosecution."

The principle thus stated was sufficiently covered by the court in its general charge to the jury. Therein the court declared to the jury, among other statements of the law pertinent to the case, that:

> "The state must prove by competent evidence every essential element of the crime charged, to the satisfaction of each and every juror, beyond a reasonable doubt."

Thus the jury were plainly told where the burden of proof lay. Again, the court instructed them that "the law presumes every man to be innocent until his guilt is established beyond a reasonable doubt," and that "this presumption attaches at every stage of the case, and to every fact essential to a conviction." Very clearly, by the foregoing language, the jury were in effect instructed, not only that the burden of proof rested upon the people, but that such burden there remained throughout the entire case and until a verdict was arrived at.

Instruction No. 7, proposed by the defendant and rejected by the court, merely contained, in effect, a statement of the rule as to reasonable doubt, which rule was fully and clearly amplified by the court in its general charge. Besides, the rejected instruction was not in proper form, so far as this case is concerned, inasmuch as it would, as proposed, have told the jury that "Henry Warner is the only person on trial before you for this alleged offense," which, obviously, was not true. However, as stated, the fact that the court did submit to the jury the principle therein declared is a sufficient answer to the complaint that its rejection was erroneous.

[6] Error is assigned in the action of the court in rejecting the following instruction, requested by the defendant:

> "In considering the evidence, if you can reasonably account for any fact in this case upon a theory or hypothesis which will admit of the defendant's innocence, and if you have a reasonable doubt of his guilt, you should acquit him."

The principle thus declared was substantially stated in the following given instruction:

> "When circumstantial evidence is relied upon to obtain a conviction, it is not only necessary that the circumstances all concur to show that the defendant committed the crime, but that all are inconsistent with any other rational theory."

See, also, given instructions Nos. 11, supra, 14 and 15, Clerk's Trans.

In a number of instructions given to the jury at the request of the defendant, the court fully and correctly stated the rules of law relating to the recent possession of stolen property by one accused of stealing the same, etc., and therefore the rejection of instruction No. 16 (page 39, Clerk's Trans.), proposed by the defendant, and covering precisely the same proposition, was not prejudicial.

Instruction No. 19, proposed by the defendant and refused by the court, is literally in the language of one of the given instructions, and its rejection was therefore proper.

There are no other points calling for special notice in this opinion.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Pleading (§ 85*)—Allowance after Time—Terms—Statutory Provisions—"Allowed by Law."

The inhibition in Code Civ. Proc. § 129, as amended by St. 1913, p. 90, empowering every court of record to make rules not inconsistent with the laws, but such rules shall not impose any tax, charge, or penalty on any legal proceeding, or for filing any pleading "allowed by law," is against the making of rules imposing a charge for the filing of a pleading allowed by law, but an answer after the expiration of the time fixed therefor can only be filed under an order made by the court in the exercise of discretion vested in it by sections 472, 473, and is not a pleading, the filing of which is "allowed by law," and courts may not make an arbitrary rule applicable alike to all cases whereby terms are imposed as a precedent condition to filing an answer after time allowed therefor by law has expired and after overruling a demurrer to the complaint.

3. Pleading (§ 85*)—Overruling Demurrer with Leave to Answer — Conditions — Construction.

An order, granting to defendant the right to answer on terms after the expiration of the time for answer and on the overruling of his demurrer to the complaint, must be considered in its entirety, and without compliance with the terms, the order must be construed as one denying the right to answer.

Petition for writ of mandate by J. Chauncey Hayes and others against J. T. Butler, County Clerk and ex-officio Clerk of the Superior Court of the County of San Diego, to compel the clerk to file an answer of the petitioners. Writ denied.

Wright & Winnek, of San Diego, for petitioners. A. J. Lee, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Joseph C. Hunter instituted an action in the superior court of San Diego county against petitioners, who interposed a demurrer to the complaint. This demurrer, submitted without argument, was overruled, at which time the court made an order as follows:

> "Defendant is permitted to answer within 10 days upon terms of payment of $10 to plaintiff or his attorneys."

Defendants (petitioners here), without paying to plaintiff or his attorneys the sum imposed as a condition of answering, presented to the county clerk, with request that he file the same, their answer to the complaint. The clerk refused to file the answer, alleging as a reason for his refusal the fact that defendants had failed to comply with the condition prescribed in the order. Petitioners ask for a writ of mandate directed to the clerk of the court requiring him to file the answer.

[1] Section 472, Code of Civil Procedure, provides, among other things, that:

> "When the demurrer to a complaint is overruled, and there is no answer filed, the court may, upon such terms as may be just, allow an answer to be filed."

Section 473 contains a like provision. Under this provision no question exists as to the power of the court, in the exercise of its discretion, to impose terms as a condition of answering after the expiration of the time given by law therefor. In the absence of an order granting leave so to do, defendants had no legal right to answer.

[2] Section 129, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1913 (St. 1913, p. 90) provides:

> "Every court of record may make rules not inconsistent with the laws of this state, for its own government and the government of its officers; but such rules shall neither impose any tax, charge or penalty upon any legal proceeding, or for filing any pleading allowed by law, nor give any allowance to any officer for services."

Petitioners contend that by virtue of this section as amended, and notwithstanding the provisions of section 472, the court was without power to impose terms as a condition of permitting the answer to be filed. This contention can only be sustained upon the theory that the provisions of sections 472 and 473 cannot be reconciled with section 129, and hence the later statute works a repeal by implication of the provisions of the former. We cannot assent to this view. In addition to the provision of 472, under which the court may, after the overruling of a demurrer and the expiration of the time to answer, permit an answer to be filed upon terms, section 473, among other things, provides that the court may allow, upon such terms as may be just, an amendment to any pleading or proceeding—

> "and may upon like terms allow an answer to be made after the time limited by this Code; and may, also, upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect."

The imposition of terms as a condition of doing any of these things could not be imposed if petitioners are right in their contention. Clearly it was not the intention of the Legislature to repeal such provisions.

The inhibition contained in section 129 is against the making of rules imposing a charge for the filing of a pleading allowed by law. An answer, after the expiration of the time fixed therefor, can only be filed by virtue of an order of court made in the exercise of the discretion vested in it by the provisions of said sections 472 and 473 (Billesbach v. Larkey, 161 Cal. 653, 120 Pac. 31); hence, it is not a pleading the filing of which is allowed by law, and therefore does not fall within the provisions of section 129, under which the court is empowered to make rules not inconsistent with the laws of this state. Sections 472 and 473 provide that the court may, in the exercise of its discretion and upon such terms as may be just, permit certain things to be done which under the law the party has no right as of course to do. Courts cannot make an arbitrary rule applicable alike to all cases, whereby terms are imposed as a precedent condition of filing an answer after demurrer overruled and time allowed therefor by law has expired. To do so would be to divest themselves of the exercise of that discretion in each particular case which the law in express terms enjoins upon them.

[3] Moreover, since the right of defendant to answer is by virtue of an order made, such order must be considered in its entirety, and without compliance with the terms thereof it must be construed, in our opinion, as an order of denial of the right to answer unless the condition imposed therein be complied with.

The writ prayed for is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the Sam Aftergut Company against Joseph Mulvihill. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hankins & Hankins, for appellant. Louis Ferrari, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff upon a nonsuit granted upon motion of the defendant.

The action is one to recover the sum of $1,474, the value of milk sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. The facts of the case are briefly as follows: After some negotiations, the parties to this action agreed orally that the plaintiff should sell, and that the defendant should purchase, a certain quantity of milk a day for a fixed price for a period of six months; and one of the stipulations of the oral arrangement was that the agreement thus arrived at should be reduced to writing and signed by both parties. It was accordingly reduced to writing, signed by the defendant, and left with McGuire & Son, milk brokers, to be signed by one Sam Aftergut, the president of the plaintiff corporation, some time when he should happen to be at the office of McGuire & Son. The contract, however, was never signed by Aftergut, nor by any one on behalf of the plaintiff, nor is it shown that the plaintiff even knew that it had been signed by the defendant. After delivering milk to the defendant for five or six weeks in the quantity specified in the contract, the plaintiff, for some reason not disclosed by the record, refused to make further deliveries; and, the defendant having failed to pay for the milk delivered, plaintiff commenced this action.

The complaint is in two counts; one for the reasonable value of the milk; and the other for the agreed price. Defendant contended in the court below, and contends here, that a recovery cannot be had on either count, for the reason that, if under the circumstances of the case the contract must be regarded as executed by the parties, the plaintiff cannot recover on the theory of an implied contract; and, on the other hand, if the contract is to be regarded as binding on both parties, then the plaintiff, not having shown any reason for discontinuing the delivery of the milk, cannot recover on the contract.

[1, 2] We think the court erred in granting the motion for a nonsuit. Plaintiff never consented to the terms of the contract, nor was it even read by any of its officers; and as it was the expressed intention of the parties that it should be reduced to writing and signed by them, certain it is that, this stipulation not having been performed, the contract cannot be regarded as binding on either of the parties (Spinney v. Downing,

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

108 Cal. 668, 41 Pac. 797); but, on the other hand, it having been admitted that the milk was received and used by the defendant in view of a contract to be entered into covering such delivery, and that the price claimed in the complaint was the reasonable value of the milk delivered, the plaintiff, it must be held, was entitled to recover on quantum meruit.

The authorities sustain the view that the oral agreement between the parties, not having been reduced to writing and signed by the plaintiff, as contemplated by the parties, did not constitute a contract. This is especially true where, as here, the proposed contract contained reciprocal covenants. In Spinney v. Downing, supra, it appeared that the understanding and agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant was that the proposed contract should be reduced to writing and signed by both parties. This, for a reason not disclosed, was not done; and the court therefore held that it never became a binding and subsisting obligation upon either party, and in that connection said:

> "It is a general rule, to which this case presents no exception, that, when it is a part of the understanding between the parties that the terms of the contract are to be reduced to writing and signed by the parties, the assent to its terms must be evidenced in the manner agreed upon, or it does not become a binding or completed contract. This is essentially true when, as here, the proposed contract contains reciprocal stipulations and covenants upon the part of each as a consideration for the acts of the other"—citing cases.

[3] The defendant also asserts that McGuire & Son were the agents of the plaintiff, and hence he claims on some theory of estoppel that plaintiff could not be heard to say that the contract was not signed by it. But the evidence does not show that McGuire & Son were any more the agents of the plaintiff than of the defendant. They, as brokers, brought the plaintiff and defendant together; they drew up the contract in question, and, as arranged, the defendant was to sign it and leave it with the brokers, who, some time when convenient, would have the plaintiff sign it also. This did not constitute them the agents of the plaintiff to the extent that their possession of the contract under the circumstances of this case would be equivalent to plaintiff's possession of it, and so give rise to a question of estoppel.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by Howard H. Fassett against E. J. Caldwell. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest K. Little, of San Francisco, for appellant. Henry J. Brodsky and Wm. M. Madden, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action brought to recover on a demand in the form of an "I O U" executed by the defendant to the plaintiff's assignor, who is the father of plaintiff.

In November, 1911, plaintiff's assignor inquired of defendant concerning a location where his son could open a store. A few days later defendant called his attention to a business conducted under the name of "Our Store, Incorporated," in which defendant was interested, and requested him to investigate it, advising him to invest $1,500 in it, if he found it a good proposition, by purchasing 300 shares of the capital stock of the corporation. Defendant took plaintiff's assignor to the store, introduced him to different persons connected with the business, requesting them to help him make a thorough investigation. After plaintiff's assignor had made a partial investigation of the business, and after, according to the evidence introduced by the defendant, he had stated that the proposed investment looked like a good one, plaintiff's assignor, at the request of the defendant, advanced $200, and two days later, on December 4, 1911, money being urgently needed in the business, advanced a further sum of $1,300. On December 6th following 300 shares were issued by the corporation in the name requested by plaintiff's assignor and delivered to him, and were subsequently receipted for by him on the books of the corporation.

Plaintiff's assignor testified that the understanding between him and the defendant was that if, after a thorough investigation of the affairs of the concern, he was satisfied to make the investment, the $1,500 was to be regarded as payment for the stock; otherwise defendant was to return the money to him—in other words, the defendant was to guarantee the investment and the "I O U" was given for this purpose. Defendant, on the other hand, introduced evidence tending to show that the understanding was that Fassett, Sr., should make a thorough examination of the business, and, if he concluded it could be made a paying proposition, he would buy 300 shares of the stock of the corporation; that he did make such investigation, declared himself satisfied, and subsequently the money was paid, and the stock delivered as just stated, and Mr. Fassett became a director and officer of the corporation. The defendant also testified that, upon receiving the second payment of $1,300, he himself suggested that he give to Mr. Fassett some memorandum showing the receipt of the money until the stock was delivered, and that he thereupon signed and gave him the "I O U" which is the basis of this suit; that he did not guarantee the purchaser against loss; that he did not personally deliver the stock; and that he forgot to demand the return of the "I O U" after such delivery.

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

On January 4, 1912, the business in question went into the hands of a receiver, and ultimately the creditors received 20 cents on the dollar.

This is the history of the case as disclosed by the record, and plaintiff's sole point is that all the evidence above narrated, which tends to show that the instrument was in the nature of a receipt, was inadmissible, for the reason that it was an attempt to vary the terms of a written contract. The evidence was admitted on the theory that it tended to show that there was no consideration passing from the plaintiff to the defendant for the "I O U," and that it was but an acknowledgment of the receipt of the $1,500. We think that for this purpose the evidence was clearly admissible. Braly v. Henry, 71 Cal. 481, 483, 11 Pac. 385, 12 Pac. 623, 60 Am. Rep. 543; Muir v. Hamilton, 152 Cal. 634, 93 Pac. 857; 9 Ency. of Evidence, p. 382.

From the evidence introduced on behalf of the defendant it appears that the "I O U" was merely a memorandum for the receipt of the money advanced by the plaintiff's assignor pending his determination to make the proposed investment, and upon his conclusion to make the investment (which the court evidently considered was satisfactorily shown) the defendant was under no obligation to return the money, but was entitled to the cancellation or return of his "I O U."

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by R. M. Foote against the San Francisco Produce Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Frick and Charles Quayle, both of Oakland, for appellant. Thomas M. Diviny, of San Francisco, and Law T. Freitas, of Stockton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment and order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial in an action for damages for the alleged breach of a written contract for the sale and purchase of a crop of grapes.

The record shows that the defendant, through its duly authorized agent, visited the plaintiff's vineyard at Linden, San Joaquin county, on October 9, 1909, and there inspected the latter's ripened crop of grapes, and thereupon, and after such inspection, entered into a written contract for the purchase of the entire crop, by the terms of which the buyer was to furnish the boxes, and the seller was to pick and deliver the grapes f. o. b. at Peters, a nearby station, for transportation to the defendant at its place of business in Oakland. On October 15th and 16th two car loads of grapes were shipped from Peters to Oakland, which arrived at their destination on or about the 19th of October. Thereupon a telephone communication occurred between the defendant and plaintiff, in the course of which the former told the latter not to ship any more grapes at that time. A few days later further talks over the telephone were had, as to the details of which the evidence is conflicting. The plaintiff testified that on these occasions he was demanding more boxes in which to pick and ship the grapes, and the defendant was objecting to the quality of the first two car loads already shipped and received, and was also instructing plaintiff not to send any more grapes until notified by the defendant so to do. The finding of the court was in favor of plaintiff's statement of the substance of these conversations, and such finding, in view of the conflict, will not be disturbed by this court.

Upon being thus advised by the defendant not to send on the rest of his crop, the plaintiff ceased picking his grapes for several days, at the end of which time he received a notification from the defendant to send on more grapes. In the meantime, however, the remainder of the unpicked crop had been ruined and rendered by rain and frost unmarketable and unfit for anything but feed for hogs. The plaintiff thereupon sold the grapes on the vines for hog food, realizing only a small part of their former value, and then sued the defendant in two counts to recover the purchase price of the two car loads of grapes which had been shipped and received by the defendant, and to also recover by way of damages the contract value of the rest of the grapes, less the modicum received upon their sale as hog food. Upon the trial of the cause the defendant conceded that the first two car loads of grapes were sound and merchantable, and that as to them the plaintiff was entitled to recover; but as to the rest of the grapes, and the plaintiff's claim of damages for their loss, the appellant makes two main contentions:

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

First, that the evidence does not sustain the findings of the court in favor of the plaintiff as to the circumstances and terms of the defendant's refusal to receive any more grapes after the first shipment and before the time when it was too late to pick and save the rest of the crop.

[1] As already stated, however, the evidence is in conflict on this point, and the findings therefore will not be disturbed.

[2] The second contention of the appellant is that, this being an executory contract between plaintiff and defendant for the sale of these grapes, the defendant's liability for its breach thereof is to be arrived at and fixed under the terms of sections 3311 and 3353 of the Civil Code. These are the Code sections prescribing that it is the duty of the seller of personal property, upon breach by the buyer of the contract of sale, to proceed to resell the property with reasonable diligence in the nearest open market and in the manner provided for sales of pledged property, and by so doing to fix the amount of detriment caused by the buyer's breach of the contract. This the appellant contends the plaintiff did not do; but in this respect we think the evidence sufficiently shows that the plaintiff did not have time to put into effect this method of fixing the amount of his damages after it was definitely known that the defendant would not abide by its contract and accept the grapes, and before the remainder of his unpicked grapes had been ruined by rain and frost; and that, after they were so ruined, they had no market value which could by any diligence or effort on the part of the plaintiff be so ascertained. This being so, we think the appellant was not entitled to rely upon the aforesaid sections of the Civil Code to defeat the plaintiff's claim of damages.

We further find that there is no merit in the appellant's objection to the amount of interest allowed to plaintiff by the terms of the judgment.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HERRON v. GEAR. (Civ. 1394.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1011*)—Findings—Conflicting Evidence—Conclusiveness.

In an action on a note, wherein the evidence was conflicting on the issue whether defendant's note, given for stock of a corporation, was given to the president as an officer of the corporation as contended by plaintiff, or to the president individually, in payment for his personal stock, a finding for plaintiff will not be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3983–3989; Dec. Dig. § 1011.*]

2. Corporations (§ 116*)—Sale of Stock—Indorsement—Construction.

In such action, an indorsement on the certificate of stock issued to defendant that it was to be paid for by the note sued on, which was delivered on condition that the certificate should not be sold until the payment was completed and a certificate thereof indorsed by the president or secretary of the corporation, construed with findings that the stock was not the property of the corporation and that it had no interest in the note given for its purchase price, did not show that defendant was entitled to pay the note to the corporation and be thereby discharged from further liability, but was only a requirement that before the stock was transferred upon the books of the corporation its officers should be able to certify that it had been fully paid for by the payment of the note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 493, 494, 496; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

3. Bills and Notes (§ 383*)—Payment to Person Not in Possession—Effect.

Defendant, in an action on a note given to the president of a corporation in payment for its stock, who at all times knew that the president individually, and not the corporation, was the owner and possessor of the note, and that in making payment thereon to the corporation he was paying to one not in a position to deliver the note when paid, made such payments at his peril, and they were no defense to an action on the note by the president's indorsee.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by William F. Herron against Lewis S. Gear. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for appellant. William F. Herron and Weinmann, Wood & Cunha, all of San Francisco, and Le Roy M. Edwards, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover the sum of $2,313 and interest, alleged to be due upon a promissory note executed by the defendant for said sum, payable six months after date to the order of himself, indorsed by him in blank, and delivered to one Wilkie L. Edwards. This note was given by the defendant in payment of a balance due upon the purchase price of 3,000 shares of the capital stock of the Pacific Slope Securities Company, a corporation, of which at the time of the transaction said Wilkie L. Edwards was president. At some time after its execution Wilkie L. Edwards indorsed and transferred the note to Lula Edwards Chase, who in turn indorsed and transferred it to the plaintiff in this action.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] Practically the only questions arising upon this appeal turn upon the issues presented by the pleadings as to the nature of the transaction in the course of which the note was given, and as to the real parties in interest therein. The appellant asserted in his answer and insisted upon the trial that the transaction for the purchase of the stock of the Pacific Slope Securities Company, in part payment of which this note was given, was one between himself and the Pacific Slope Securities Company, and that the part which Wilkie L. Edwards took in that transaction was simply that of president and representative of that corporation; that he received the note in question in that capacity and in none other, and that the stock which was issued to the defendant and in part payment for which this note was given was the stock of the Pacific Slope Securities Company, owned by it at the time and issued to the defendant as its purchaser; and the defendant follows up these pleadings and proofs with the showing that before the note was due he went to the office of the corporation and there paid the whole amount of this note, which said payment the said corporation accepted, as he contends, either as payment in full of the amount due upon the sale of its stock, or as the trustee of Wilkie L. Edwards or his successors in ownership of this note; and that by such payment the liability of the defendant on account of this note has been fully discharged.

These contentions on the part of the defendant were resisted by the plaintiff upon the trial, in the course of which evidence was presented on behalf of the plaintiff tending strongly to show that the original transaction was one between Wilkie L. Edwards individually and the defendant, that the stock transferred to the latter was the personal stock of Edwards, and that he was and was understood by the defendant to be the real party in interest in the matter, and as such the owner of the note. The evidence upon this subject being clearly conflicting, and the trial court having resolved such conflict in favor of the plaintiff's contention, this court will not undertake to disturb its findings in that respect.

During the course of the trial the defendant offered in evidence a certain indorsement upon the certificate of stock issued to him in the following words:

> "This certificate of stock is sold to Lewis S. Gear upon the following terms of payment: Promissory note for $2,313.00, dated May 13th, 1909, due November 15th, 1909, with interest at the rate of six (6%) per annum—and is delivered upon the express condition that the same shall not be sold, transferred, hypothecated, or otherwise disposed of, until the foregoing conditions of payment are fully met and completed, and a certificate of the same endorsed hereon by the president or secretary of this corporation; the above conditions subject, however, that any portion of this may be transferred upon the payment of a proportionate amount of money of said indebtedness.
> "[Signed] F. C. Ballentine, Secretary.
> "[Signed] Lewis S. Gear."

The defendant insisted at the trial, and here insists, that the terms of this indorsement establish two things: First, that the transaction was one with the corporation; and, second, that by the terms of this indorsement the defendant was required, and hence entitled, to pay the sum due upon his note to the corporation, and that having done so he was thereby discharged from further liability upon his obligation.

As to the first of these contentions, it is disposed of by the findings of the court.

[2] As to the second, it appears that the indorsement does not upon its face purport to require that any money shall be paid to the corporation, or that it shall be entitled to demand or receive any, but only requires that before the stock is transferred upon the books of the corporation its officers shall be placed in a position to certify that the stock has been fully paid for through the payment of the promissory note which had been issued for a portion of its purchase price. That this is the proper construction to be placed upon this document would seem quite clear when it is read in connection with the testimony of the officers of the corporation and the findings of the court to the effect that this stock was not the property of the corporation, and that it had no interest in the promissory note which had been issued for a portion of its purchase price.

[3] The court further finds, and the evidence is sufficient to sustain it in so doing, that the defendant knew at all times that Wilkie L. Edwards and not the corporation was the owner and was in the actual possession of this note, and that in making whatever payment he did make on account of this note to the corporation, or to any person other than its holder, he was paying the amount due on the note to a person or persons not in or entitled to its possession, and hence not in a position to deliver up to him his note when paid. One who pays a negotiable note before its maturity to another not its possessor does so at his peril; and this seems from the evidence and findings in this case to be what the defendant has done.

We find no error in the record sufficient to justify a reversal of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 83*)—MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 69*)—PERSONAL RIGHTS—IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

St. 1911, pp. 1268, 1269, providing for the time of payment of wages by employers, and making a violation of the act a misdemeanor punishable by a fine, is contrary to Const. art. 1, § 15, forbidding imprisonment for debt in any civil action, unless in cases of fraud, since a defendant charged with the offense thereby created may be arrested, and, if unable to give bond, be committed to jail until his trial.

Application by Arthur Crane for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged from custody.

James W. Cochrane, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Albert T. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The court is prepared to render its decision from notes made at the argument.

In this proceeding the petitioner seeks by habeas corpus to be released from the custody of the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco, who held and confined the petitioner in the city prison under a warrant of arrest which was issued out of the police court of said city and county upon a complaint which charged the petitioner with the commission of a misdemeanor in this, that he had violated the provisions of section 1 of an act entitled "An act providing for the time of payment of wages." The provisions of the act in question are as follows:

> "Section 1. Whenever an employer discharges an employé the wages earned and unpaid at the time of such discharge shall become due and payable immediately. When any such employé not having a contract for a definite period quits or resigns his employment the wages earned and unpaid at the time of such quitting or resignation shall become due and payable five days thereafter.
> "Sec. 2. All wages other than those mentioned in section 1 of this act earned by any person during any one month shall become due and payable at least once in each month and no person, firm or corporation for whom such labor has been performed, shall withhold from any such employé any wages so earned or unpaid for a longer period than fifteen days after such wages become due and payable; provided, however, that nothing herein shall in any way limit or interfere with the right of any such employé to accept from any such person, firm or corporation wages earned and unpaid for a shorter period than one month.
> "Sec. 3. Any person, firm or corporation who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not to exceed five hundred dollars.
>
> "Sec. 4. None of the provisions of this act shall apply to any county, city and county, incorporated city or town, or other municipal corporation."
> Stats. 1911, pp. 1268–9.

It is the contention of the petitioner that the act above quoted is unconstitutional in this, that it, in effect, permits an imprisonment on mesne process for debt, and that therefore his arrest and detention by the respondent pending a hearing of the charge in the police court is illegal.

In our opinion, this contention is sound, and must be sustained. Section 15 of article 1 of our state Constitution provides in part that:

> "No person shall be imprisoned for debt in any civil action, on mesne or final process, unless in cases of fraud. * * *"

By this constitutional provision the right of a creditor to control and confine the person of his debtor by the process of arrest, which the law at one time gave the creditor for the enforcement of his debt, has been abolished, and, happily, is prohibited in this state, save and except that the body of a debtor may be seized and confined in cases where it is made to appear that the indebtedness was fraudulently contracted, or that there has been an attempted fraudulent disposition of the property of the debtor with the intent to delay or defeat the payment of the debt.

In the exceptional cases noted it will be observed that fraud must exist before a debtor may be subjected to arrest and imprisonment, and that in such cases the arrest and imprisonment permitted by various statutes do not fall within the inhibition of the Constitution, for the obvious reason that the penalty prescribed is not for or on account of the failure to pay the creditor's demand, but solely because of the fraud alleged to have been committed in the creation of the debt or in a subsequent attempt to delay or defeat its satisfaction, by a transfer, removal, or concealment of the property of the debtor.

It will be noted that the statute in controversy does not involve the element of fraud as an essential of the offense defined therein. True, the statute does not provide imprisonment as the penalty for the failure of an employer to pay a debt due to his employé. The statute, however, is silent as to the process by which the magistrate before whom complaint is made of an alleged violation of the statute may obtain jurisdiction of the person of the offender. In the case at bar jurisdiction was attempted to be obtained by a resort to the provisions of sections 812 and 813 of the Penal Code, which authorize the issuance of a warrant of arrest when the magistrate is satisfied from the deposition presented to him that the offense complained of has been committed, and that there is reasonable ground to believe that the party charged has committed it. By this process and under our system of procedure a defendant unable to give bail is jailed and restrained of his liberty until such time as a hearing can be conveniently had of the charge made against him. It will thus be seen that the statute in controversy was attempted to be enforced by the issuance and execution of a mesne process which, in the case at bar, resulted in the temporary imprisonment of the petitioner, and the cause of his imprisonment is to be found primarily in the fact that he is unwilling or, perchance, unable to discharge a debt which was not conceived or contracted in fraud of his creditor. To this extent the arrest of the petitioner necessarily is in conflict with the fundamental law of the state, and therefore illegal.

For the reasons stated, it is ordered that the petitioner be, and he is hereby, discharged from the custody of the respondent.

LOWENBERG v. L. JACOBSON'S SONS.
(Civ. 1300.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 19, 1914.)

1. Attachment (§ 25*)—Grounds for Attachment—Nonresidence.

Code Civ. Proc. § 537, subd. 1, provides for attachment in an action on a contract for the direct payment of money, while subdivision 2 authorizes attachment upon a contract against a defendant not residing in the state. Held that, where a nonresident agreed to pay plaintiff a stipulated commission on sales, payments to be made within the state, attachment could be issued for the amount due as the contract was one for the payment of money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 61–72; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

2. Attachment (§ 92*)—Affidavits—Sufficiency.

Code Civ. Proc. § 538, subd. 2, provides that the affidavit for attachment shall recite that the defendant is indebted to plaintiff, specifying the amount, and that the defendant is a nonresident. An affidavit for attachment averred that, over and above all legal set-offs and counterclaims upon an express contract for the payment of money, defendant was indebted to plaintiff in a named sum, which indebtedness was not secured by any mortgage or lien, and that defendants were nonresidents. Held, that the affidavit was sufficient, for, while going further than the statute, it was not vitiated by reason of surplusage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 238, 239; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 662*) — Record — Transcript—Conclusiveness.

The recitals of the transcript are conclusive as to the happenings at trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2850–2852; Dec. Dig. § 662.*]

4. Attachment (§ 122*)—Affidavit—Amendment.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 558, providing that, upon application to dissolve a writ of attachment, if improperly or irregularly issued, must be discharged, but shall not be discharged if at or before hearing the writ or the affidavit or the undertaking shall be amended so as to conform to law, the court may, after application to discharge a writ of attachment, but prior to adjudication, allow the affidavit to be amended so as to conform to law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 323–337; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

5. Attachment (§ 129*)—Undertaking—Sufficiency.

Where the action was really against only one defendant, and plaintiff was uncertain whether it constituted a partnership or a corporation, an undertaking payable to the defendant which had a plural name instead of to the several defendants is sufficient to support an attachment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–359; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

6. Appeal and Error (§ 190*)—Objections not Made Below.

The undertaking for an attachment cannot first be attacked on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1216–1220; Dec. Dig. § 190;* Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 898.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by H. Lowenberg against L. Jacobson's Sons. From an order refusing to dissolve an attachment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lloyd S. Ackerman, of San Francisco, for appellants. Harry C. Morrison, of Oakland, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment. The complaint set forth that the defendants are residents of the state of New York; that they are engaged in the business of selling clothing and wearing apparel to the trade; that their principal place of business is located in said state; that each of them has been continuously absent from the state from September, 1907, up to and including the month of December, 1911; "that during the month of September, 1907, said plaintiff and said defendants entered into an agreement in writing, made and executed in the state of California, whereby it was understood and agreed that said plaintiff should handle defendants' lines of goods in that territory located west of Denver, Colo., selling the same by sample, on a basis of 7½ per cent. commission on all orders checked and shipped, deducting all returns, commissions to be paid from the 1st to the 10th of each month for goods shipped during the previous month; that said plaintiff's headquarters were located in the state of California; that said agreement was in full force and effect continuously from the said month of September, 1907, up to and including the month of December, 1911." Then followed allegations that during all of said time there existed between said parties an open, mutual, and current account; that defendants had withheld from plaintiff commissions to which he was and is entitled, and that erroneous charges against plaintiff had been made by defendants in said account; "that the aforesaid commissions, so withheld as aforesaid, and the charges so made and entered as aforesaid, amount to the sum of $460, in excess of any and all credits or sums of money due, owing, or coming to said defendants from said plaintiff; that said plaintiff has made many demands upon said defendants for said sum of $460, but that said defendants have refused, failed, and neglected to pay to said plaintiff said sum of $460; * * * that no part of said sum of $460 has been paid, and there is still due, owing, and coming to said plaintiff from said defendants the sum of $460."

[1] We entertain no doubt that the cause of action thus stated constitutes the legal basis for the issuance of a writ of attachment as provided by our statute. The said complaint, in connection with the affidavit thereafter filed, clearly discloses that the action was upon an express contract "for the direct payment of money," and that the said contract was made in this state, and was not "secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property, or any pledge of personal property. The situation is therefore entirely within the contemplation of subdivision 1 of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But the provision of the statute applicable to this case is even more circumscribed. It is found in subdivision 2 of said section, as follows:

> "The plaintiff, at the time of issuing the summons, or at any time afterward, may have the property of the defendant attached: * * * 2. In an action upon a contract, express or implied, against a defendant not residing in this state."

As we have seen, the defendants, at the time of the beginning of the action, were residents of the state of New York, and it is positively averred that they entered into a written contract to pay plaintiff a certain commission for sales of merchandise, and that so much money was due and owing to plaintiff under said contract. It is not necessary that the contract itself should specify the total amount of money to be paid. That, of course, in this case depended upon the number and extent of the sales that should be made by plaintiff. The requirement of the statute is satisfied when the contract furnishes the measure of liability or the information from which the amount due can be ascertained. This is not at all the case of unliquidated damages for which an attachment cannot be had. The distinction is clear, and it is pointed out in several decisions of the Supreme Court. In De Leonis v. Etchepare, 120 Cal. 410, 52 Pac. 718, it is said:

> "Nor is it necessary, in order to give a right of attachment, that the amount in which the defendant may be liable should appear upon the face of the contract or instrument by or from which the liability is to be determined. It often happens that the amount due under a contract does not appear from the contract itself. 'Our Code does not require that the amount due on the contract shall appear from the contract itself (Code Civ. Proc. § 537), but that the amount of the indebtedness shall be shown by affidavit (Code Civ. Proc. § 538). Attachment may issue in an action for damages for the breach of a contract. Donnelly v. Strueven, 63 Cal. 182. And this, where proof is necessary at the trial to show the amount of damages. Drake on Attachment, §§ 13, 23. But there must exist a basis upon which the damages can be determined by proof.' Dunn v. Mackey, 80 Cal. 107 [22 Pac. 64]. Where the contract does not furnish the measure of the liability of the defendant, and the damages are unliquidated, an attachment cannot be had, and the language quoted by appellant from Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161, means no more than that."

As to the cases from other states, cited by appellants, we may appropriately adopt the following comment from Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 12, 33 Pac. 742:

> "The attachment laws of the several states differ in so many particulars that, without the utmost caution in comparing their provisions with our own, we are in constant danger of being led astray, or unduly influenced by decisions apparently in point, but in reality resting upon a different basis. Even our own adjudicated cases, many of them growing out of questions applicable to resident debtors, have no proper application to the different status occupied by nonresidents."

[2] There is no ground for any criticism of the sufficiency of respondent's amended affidavit, which was formally executed and contained the following averments:

> "That the above-named defendants are, and were on the 13th day of September, 1912, indebted to said plaintiff in the sum of $460, over and above all legal set-offs and counterclaims, upon an express contract for the direct payment of money, to wit, for commissions due plaintiff from said defendants for selling and disposing of said defendants' goods; that such contract was made and executed in this state, and that the payment of the same was not and has not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property, or any pledge of personal property; that the said defendants are, and were on the said 13th day of September, 1912, nonresidents of the state of California, to wit, residents of the state of New York; that the said sum for which the attachment was and is asked and sought herein was and is an actual bona fide existing debt due and owing from the said defendants to the said plaintiff; that the said attachment was and is not sought, and the said action was and is not prosecuted, to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors of the said defendants, or any creditor or creditors of either of said defendants."

How completely and punctiliously plaintiff thus complied with the demands of the statute is made apparent by a reading of section 538 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Indeed, he exceeded the requirement of subdivision 2 of said section, which is applicable to the present case. His redundant averments, however, did not vitiate nor impair the affidavit, nor interfere with its operation as a legal step in the statutory process of obtaining a writ of attachment.

[3, 4] There is some question, however, as to whether the amended affidavit was filed in time. The record shows that, on the 15th day of November, 1912, the court submitted the motion to dissolve the attachment, and that the amended affidavit was not filed until December 20th following. It was filed, though, before the court passed upon said motion. It is stated by respondent that "said matter was not finally submitted on said 15th day of November, 1912, for both attorneys for appellants and respondent filed points and authorities thereafter," but the recital of the transcript must be accepted as conclusive. Section 558 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, upon application to dissolve a writ of attachment, if it satisfactorily appears that it "was improperly or irregularly issued it must be discharged; provided, that such attachment shall not be discharged if at or before the hearing of such application, the writ of attachment, or the affidavit or undertaking upon which such attachment was based shall be amended and made to conform to the provisions of this chapter." We think there is a substantial compliance with the requirement of this provision where the amended affidavit is filed before the actual determination of the motion to dissolve the attachment. Although not shown by the record, it may be, as stated by respondent, that:

> "On the 1st day of November, 1912, when the motion to dissolve attachment came on regularly for hearing, the respondent, through his attorney, moved the court for permission to amend the writ of attachment or the affidavit or undertaking upon which such attachment was based to conform to all the requirements of chapter 4, tit. 7, pt. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, the court at that time informed the attorneys for appellants and respondent that if it was found that the action was one in which an attachment could properly issue, and that amendments to any of the requirements were necessary, that such permission would be granted."

We may assume that the proceeding was as thus indicated, and we think that the court had authority to allow the amended affidavit to be filed after the application was made, but prior to the adjudication of the motion to discharge the attachment.

[5] Appellants also question the sufficiency of the undertaking, and direct their attack particularly at the expression of the obligation of the surety in the following language:

> "Does hereby undertake and promise to the effect that, if the said defendants or either of them recover judgment in said action, the said plaintiff will pay all costs that may be awarded to the said defendants and all damages which they may sustain by reason of the said attachment, not exceeding the sum of $200, and that, if said attachment is discharged on the ground that plaintiff was not entitled thereto, under section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff will pay all damages which defendant may sustain by reason of the said attachment, not exceeding the sum of $200."

The point is that the obligation should have been assumed and declared in favor of each of the defendants, but by said undertaking liability was imposed upon the surety only for damages that might be suffered by all the defendants collectively. It is claimed that the same rule in this respect applies to the undertaking as to the affidavit and reference is had to Pajaro Valley Bank v. Scurich, 7 Cal. App. 732, 95 Pac. 911, wherein it was held that:

> "Where the writ of attachment was against the maker and indorsers of a promissory note, an affidavit for the writ, merely stating 'that the attachment is not sought and the action is not prosecuted to hinder, delay or defraud any creditor or creditors of the defendants,' without adding the words, 'or any creditor of either of said defendants' is fatally defective, and a motion to discharge the writ on that ground should have been granted."

See, however, Nichols v. Davis, 23 Cal. App. 67, 137 Pac. 41.

But, passing that point, while the complaint here is somewhat loosely drawn, we think it sufficiently appears that the action was really against only one defendant—that is, L. Jacobson's Sons—the plaintiff being uncertain whether defendant constituted a partnership or a corporation, and it may be stated that there was no prayer for an individual judgment against the members of the association.

[6] Besides, the record does not show that any attack was made upon the amended undertaking; the notice of motion to dissolve having been addressed to the original bond. Indeed, it is declared by respondent in his brief that the attorney for appellants stated in open court that he did not rely upon any objection to the undertaking, and that he so stated to the judge of the lower court and to the attorney for respondent upon the settlement of the bill of exceptions; the attorney for the respondent requesting that a statement to that effect be inserted in said bill. It was not so inserted, but it may be said that it does not affirmatively appear that at the hearing of said motion any objection was made to said undertaking, and appellants have not denied nor questioned the accuracy of said statement in respondent's brief.

No sufficient reason has been presented for interfering with the action of the lower court, and the order is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

SOUTHERN PAC. CO. v. CITY OF SANTA CRUZ. (Civ. 1400.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 23, 1914. Rehearing Denied Dec. 22, 1914.)

1. Limitation of Actions (§ 183*)—Pleading—Sufficiency—Statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 458, providing that in pleading limitations it shall not be necessary to state the facts showing the defense, but the plea may state generally that the action is barred by a provision of the statute cited, and that if the special allegation is controverted the pleader must establish facts showing a bar, a plea "that said action is barred by the statute of limitations" was insufficient.

2. Appeal and Error (§ 194*)—Sufficiency of Pleading—Waiver of Objection.

In an action for the price of merchandise, wherein the sole defense of limitations was insufficiently pleaded, plaintiff, who on the trial treated it as sufficient and stipulated for judgment on that issue, waived any objection to the plea, and could not be heard upon appeal to urge its insufficiency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1241–1246; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 1022*)—Actions on Claims—Limitation.

A claim against a city, whose charter (St. 1875–76, p. 193, § 11) provided that every claim should be filed with the city clerk and presented to the common council, and if so allowed should be presented to the mayor for approval, and if he failed or refused to approve it within 10 days must again be allowed by the council, did not ripen into a cause of action prior to its presentation and rejection, and an action thereon brought within the statutory period thereafter might be maintained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2193; Dec. Dig. § 1022.*]

4. Stipulations (§ 14*) — Construction — Entry of Judgment.

In an action for the price of merchandise sold, where the only defense was that it was barred by limitations, a stipulation that if the court determined that the action was not barred it should render judgment for plaintiff, and that if the action was barred it should render judgment for defendant, a reversal of judgment for the defendant entitled plaintiff to a direction to the trial court to enter judgment in its favor for the amount of its claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. §§ 24–37; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

5. Sales (§ 187*)—Action for Price—Liquidated Damages—Interest.

Where the parties had agreed that the total price for goods sold should be the sum of $1,628, plaintiff on a recovery was entitled to interest at the statutory rate from the commencement of his action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Company against the City of Santa Cruz. Judgment of nonsuit, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed, with direction to another judgment for plaintiff.

Chas. M. Cassin, of San Jose (James L. Atteridge, of San Jose, of counsel), for appellant. J. Leslie Johnston, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $1,628.59, and interest, alleged to be due upon an account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant at its special instance and request. The defendant in its answer denied the indebtedness and also pleaded that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The essential facts of the case, as disclosed at the trial, are these: In the month of December, 1906, the plaintiff sold to the defendant 231 feet of new water pipe at a price which was not then fixed, but which was thereafter to be agreed upon. In February, 1907, the plaintiff made a further sale of old water pipe to the defendant, and it was then agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant through the duly authorized agents of each that the total price for both lots of pipe sold should be $1,628.59. In October, 1907, the plaintiff duly filed with the clerk and presented to the common council of the defendant its claim and demand in due form for the allowance and payment of the sum of $1,628.59 due upon this account, which claim the said council at some date in the month of October, 1907, by vote of its members rejected. This action was commenced on April 2, 1909. At the close of the plaintiff's case, in which the foregoing facts were proven, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the sole ground that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. During the course of the argument of this motion, the trial court inquired of counsel for the defendant if he proposed to offer any evidence in defense of plaintiff's case, to which counsel for the defendant responded that the defendant had no witnesses and did not propose to offer any testimony or evidence in defense. It was thereupon stipulated that the jury in attendance should be dismissed, and that, if the court determined upon the pending motion for nonsuit that the cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations, it should render judgment for plaintiff for the amount due upon its claim, but that, if it should determine that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, judgment should be for the defendant. The cause having been submitted upon this stipulation, the court held that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and a judgment of nonsuit was entered. It is from this judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial that the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] The first contention of the appellant is that the plea of the statute of limitations as a bar to this action was ineffectually presented in the answer of the defendant. The form of said plea is simply "that said action is barred by the statute of limitations." It is conceded by the respondent that a plea of the statute in this general way is insufficient to satisfy the requirement of section 458 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but it is further contended by the respondent that not only did the plaintiff fail to raise the question of the insufficiency of this portion of the answer by a demurrer thereto, but that, upon the trial, its plea of the statute was treated as sufficient, and that in point of fact the only question in the case presented to the court by the stipulation of the parties upon the motion for nonsuit was the question as to whether the plaintiff's cause of action was or was not barred by the statute of limitations. The record in the case bears out this contention, and justifies this court in holding that the plaintiff, having treated the defendant's plea of the statute as sufficient upon the trial, must be held to have waived its objection to it and cannot be heard upon appeal to urge its insufficiency. Churchill v. Woodworth, 148 Cal. 669, 84 Pac. 155, 113 Am. St. Rep. 324; Mullenary v. Burton, 3 Cal. App. 263, 84 Pac. 159.

[3] The appellant further contends that the trial court was in error in holding that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations upon the undisputed facts before it. The question of law involved in this contention is this: The charter of the city of Santa Cruz (Stats. of California, 1875–76, p. 193, § 11) provides as follows:

> "Every claim and demand that shall arise against the city of Santa Cruz shall be filed with the city clerk, and presented to the common council, and, if found correct, shall be allowed and ordered paid by a majority vote of the councilmen elected; and, when so allowed, shall be presented to the mayor for approval, and if he approves such allowance, he shall endorse his approval upon such claim or demand, and if he fail or refuse to approve such allowance within ten days, the said claim or demand, in order to render the same payable, must be allowed and ordered paid by the votes of three councilmen."

The question is as to whether the plaintiff, prior to its presentation of its claim and demand to the city clerk and common council of the city of Santa Cruz in the manner provided by this section of its charter, had a ripened cause of action upon the account in question here, upon which it could and therefore should have commenced and maintained an action within the statutory period after the date of creation of the claim. Under the authorities from this and other states construing similar statutes and charters requiring the presentation of claims and demands to the officials of a city as a prerequisite to their payment, we are constrained to hold that in this case the plaintiff's claim and demand against the city of Santa Cruz had not ripened into a cause of action upon which it could have begun and maintained a suit prior to the date of the presentation and rejection of its claim. Bancroft v. City of San Diego, 120 Cal. 432, 52 Pac. 712; Sheridan v. City of Salem, 14 Or. 925, 12 Pac. 925; Stackpole v. School District, 9 Or. 508; Yavapai County v. O'Neill, 3 Ariz. 363, 29 Pac. 432.

The respondent herein cites the case of Gill v. City of Oakland, 124 Cal. 335, 57 Pac. 150 as laying down a different rule; but an examination of the record in that case discloses that the charter of the city of Oakland as it stood at the time that case arose contained no provision for the presentation of claims to the council of the city before payment, and further discloses that the plaintiff in that case did in fact present his claim to the auditor of the city, as required by its charter, and only brought his suit after the failure or refusal of the proper officials of the city to take action thereon. We think that the contention of the appellant must therefore be sustained.

Counsel for the respective parties discuss in their briefs another point as to the nature of the account sued upon; but, in the light of the views last above expressed by the court as to the time when the plaintiff's claim first ripened into an actionable cause, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the particular nature of the plaintiff's account, for, whatever its quality as an open or stated or simple account, the action upon it was brought within the time required by the statute.

[4, 5] The appellant claims that in the event of a reversal of the judgment it is entitled to have a direction to the trial court to enter judgment in its favor for the amount of its claim, together with interest at the statutory rate from the date of the commencement of the action. The right of the appellant to the entry of a judgment for the amount of its claim seems covered by the stipulation; and as to the allowance of interest upon a claim of this character, the action of the court is controlled by the case of Martyn v. Western Pacific Railway Company, 21 Cal. App. 589, 132 Pac. 602.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,628.59, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from April 2, 1909, until the date of entry of such judgment.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 20, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 18, 1915.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1111*)—Reversal of Judgment—Power of Court.

Under Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action for divorce by Maria Machado against Frank B. Machado. From a judgment awarding to the parties their respective proportions of the community property, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Joseph Rafael, of San Francisco, for appellant. A. M. Free and C. L. Witten, both of San Jose, and R. V. Burns, of Mountain View, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment of the trial court in an action for divorce upon the ground of cruelty on the part of the offending spouse; the portion of the judgment which is assailed upon this appeal being that wherein the court undertook to award to the parties their respective and rightful proportions of the community property. The case is presented for review upon the judgment roll, and it is practically conceded by the respective parties that the judgment in the respect in question is not in accord with the findings and therefore cannot stand.

The only serious dispute between the parties is as to the power and duty of this court in the premises. The appellant contends that in appeals of this character it is the proper function and only duty of the court to modify the judgment so as to make it conform to the findings in the case, and her counsel cites numerous cases showing that this has been the frequent practice of courts of last resort in appeals involving as their only issue the disagreement between the judgment and the findings in the case.

[1, 2] We can well understand that in many cases where the court has made a miscalculation as to the proper amount of a money judgment, or has been mistaken as to the law applicable to the facts as found, it would be the plain and simple duty of the appellate court to modify the judgment so as to correct the mistake or conform to the law of the case; but we do not understand or agree that the power of this court upon appeal is limited in this class of cases to that form of relief. The Code provides that the Supreme Court of this state may "affirm, reverse, or modify any judgment or order appealed from, and may direct the proper judgment or order to be entered, or direct a new trial or further proceedings to be had." Code Civ. Proc. § 53. The Constitution, in the creation of the District Courts of Appeal, has expressly provided that "all statutes now in force allowing, providing for, or regulating appeals to the Supreme Court, shall apply to appeals to the District Court of Appeal." Const. art. 6, § 4. Under the plenary grant of power with which this court has thus been invested, we have no doubt as to our full authority to either affirm or reverse or modify the judgment or order of the trial court in any case before us, and we are further satisfied from an inspection of the record of this case that it is a proper one for reversal and for remission to the lower court for a new trial.

A comparison of the findings and judgment in the case made in the light of the express language and direction of section 146 of the Civil Code, defining the power and duty of the trial court in the matter of the proper division of community property in actions for divorce upon the ground of cruelty, leaves no doubt in our minds that the trial judge in this case either acted inadvertently in the adoption of the findings and determination of the proper judgment to be given thereon, or that he had other facts and circumstances in mind in rendering the judgment than those which the findings contain or the record discloses. In other words, it is impossible to reconcile this judgment with the findings, upon the theory either of a miscalculation based upon the facts found or upon a mistake in the terms of the law. This being so, it is clearly the duty of this court to reverse this judgment and remand the case to the trial court for the correction by it upon a new trial of the manifest error in its findings or its judgment, or both.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Election contest by David Waite against Edward Brendlin. Judgment for contestant, and contestee appeals. Reversed.

Carlton W. Greene, of Paso Robles, for appellant. Alex Webster, of Paso Robles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Election contest. David Waite, contestant, was a duly elected and qualified member of the board of trustees of the city of El Paso de Robles, when a proceeding was instituted for his recall and removal as such member of said board. At said election the contestee, Edward Brendlin, was the only candidate for election to said office in the event of a vacancy therein occurring by reason of a majority of the votes cast by the electors favoring the recall of Waite. The result of the election, as declared by the board of canvassers, was that upon the question, "Shall David Waite be recalled from the office of member of the board of trustees?" 345 votes were cast "yes" thereon, and 344 votes cast "no" thereon, and that Edward Brendlin received as a candidate for said office to succeed David Waite 304 votes; whereupon it was declared that Waite had been recalled and Brendlin elected to fill the office for the unexpired term. Thereupon Waite instituted this contest, and the proceedings had thereon were in accordance with the provisions of title 2, part 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the contesting of certain elections. Section 1111 of said title provides:

> "Any elector * * * of a * * * city * * * may contest the right of any person declared elected to an office to be exercised therein, for any of the following causes: (1) For malconduct on the part of the board of judges, or any member thereof. * * * (4) On account of illegal votes."

The grounds of the contest, as alleged in the statement, are the first and fourth as above stated, namely, that the judges of election refused to count certain legal ballots voted against the recall of Waite, contestant herein, and did count and make return of certain illegal ballots voted in favor of his recall; it being further alleged that, had said illegal ballots counted in favor of the recall been rejected and said uncounted legal ballots against the recall counted, the result of the election would have been against the recall of contestant. The court upon trial found the number of votes cast "yes" on said proposition for the recall of Waite to have been 338, and those cast against said proposition to have been 341, and that the majority of the votes cast upon the proposition were against the recall. Judgment for contestant followed, from which the contestee appeals upon the judgment roll.

[1-3] Both by demurrer, which was overruled, and an answer the allegations of which were found to be untrue, the contestee alleged the insufficiency of the statement to constitute a cause of contest, want of legal capacity in contestant to maintain the contest, and further alleged that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject of the proceedings, which was the removal of Waite from office and not the election of Brendlin to fill the vacancy. The question presented, therefore, is whether or not the provisions of said title relating to the contest of certain elections can be invoked by one removed from office by means of the recall provisions of the statute. If malconduct, without any limitation or qualification on the part of the board of judges, or the reception of illegal votes in favor of the recall, were grounds of contest, it might well be said that the provisions of title 2, part 3, Code of Civil Procedure, were applicable to a case of this kind. But the effect of these two specified grounds for recall is limited by other sections of the Code. Thus in section 1112, Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided that the misconduct of the election officers specified in section 1111 must be "such as to procure the person whose right to the office is contested to be declared elected, when he had not received the highest number of legal votes." It thus appears that this ground of removal can only be invoked in a case where the contestee, or party declared elected, did not receive the highest number of legal votes. It is conceded that Brendlin, being the only candidate to succeed Waite in case of his recall, received all the votes cast, and no attack is made upon the legality of the votes so cast for him. Hence, having received the highest number of legal votes, no right of contest upon such ground is accorded to Waite. The fact that the board refused to count legal votes against the recall, while misconduct, is not made a ground for contest, since it is conceded that Brendlin did receive the highest number of legal votes for the office. And so with the reception of illegal votes, which, under section 1114, Code of Civil Procedure, constitutes no ground for contest unless the result would have been different and another candidate elected. It is not alleged that any illegal votes were cast for Brendlin; the alleged illegal votes were cast in favor of the recall of Waite. But, under the limitation provided in said section 1114, this is not made a ground for contest, since the illegal votes must have been counted in favor of the one declared elected and who would not have been so declared except for the counting in his favor of such votes. scribing the judgment which the court may render clearly show that the provisions of the act are not applicable to a contest by one recalled from an office. As stated, the subject of the proceeding set forth in the statement is not misconduct affecting the election of Brendlin, or the counting of illegal votes in his favor; but the allegations relate solely and alone to the action of said board in so far as it brought about the recall of contestant. The provisions for removal of an official by recall proceedings are the subject of quite recent legislation, while the provisions for contesting an election were enacted in 1872 and have continued without material change down to the present date. Clearly it was not the intention of the Legislature that said provisions should apply to a recall election. And it is equally clear, when the language of said title is construed in accordance with the plain import of the language used, that said provisions have no application to such case.

"The right to contest an election is purely statutory, and must be determined in accordance with the terms of the statute." Powers v. Hitchcock, 129 Cal. 325, 61 Pac. 1076; Austin v. Dick, 100 Cal. 201, 34 Pac. 655.

Conceding that illegal votes were cast and counted in favor of contestant's recall, and that he has suffered in being wrongfully ousted from office by another, his remedy is not a proceeding by contest pursuant to the provisions of title 2, part 3, Code of Civil Procedure.

Respondent insists that, conceding there be no statutory provision giving the right of contest in a recall election, such right nevertheless exists by implication. This by reason of the fact that the Constitution provides for an election and makes no provision for contesting the same. In answer to this we may repeat that this proceeding is pursuant to the provisions of title 2, part 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is a statutory proceeding for the summary determination of the right to an office, limited and restricted to cases only mentioned therein and upon the grounds specified therein. Since this case does not fall within those provisions, it cannot be said that contestant has any right by implication to invoke the same.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Louisa Brunner against Herman Brunner for divorce, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. Decree for defendant, from which and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Pending the appeal, defendant died, and the Title Insurance & Trust Company, his special administrator, was substituted. Affirmed.

Earl Rogers, W. H. Dehm, and Waterman, Westover & Green, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. H. A. Massey and Hunsaker & Britt, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the plaintiff Louisa Brunner, one of the appellants herein, sought to obtain a decree of divorce from the defendant Herman Brunner, and to compel him to provide for the maintenance of plaintiff and the minor children of the marriage. In addition to his defense, Herman Brunner filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff and their daughter Theresa Brunner (in whose name the plaintiff had placed certain personal property). By his cross-action the plaintiff's husband sought to establish his ownership of real and personal property in California, described in the cross-complaint, which property had been purchased by the plaintiff with sums of money brought by her from the state of Missouri, where these parties formerly resided. Herman Brunner alleged that all of this money was his own separate property, although held in the name of plaintiff. The plaintiff, while admitting that the entire estate was originally in the form of money earned by the defendant or acquired as profits of his business, alleged that all of this money had been received by her in various sums as gifts from the defendant, or was money derived by her from the sale of property which she had purchased with sums of money received by her as gifts from the defendant. The findings of the court were in favor of the defendant on the issues tendered by the complaint, and were also in his favor with respect to the cause of action stated in the cross-complaint. By the decree as entered it was adjudged that the transfers made by the plaintiff to Theresa Brunner were made without consideration and were fraudulent as against Herman Brunner and were declared to be canceled and annulled; that the plaintiff holds all right, title, interest, and possession acquired by her in said property (with certain exceptions not necessary to discuss) in trust for Herman Brunner as his separate property. The usual provision appropriate to such cases was made requiring conveyances and assignments of the property to the cross-complainant. After entry of the judgment and after appeal therefrom by the plaintiff, and while her motion for a new trial was pending in the superior court, Herman Brunner died, and the respondent was appointed special administrator of his estate. The motion for a new trial having been denied, an appeal was taken from the order denying that motion.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify sundry specified findings of fact, and particularly urges that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the moneys received by her from Herman Brunner were not delivered to her as gifts from him. According to the laws of the state of Missouri, where all of the money above mentioned was acquired by the defendant, that money and the proceeds thereof in any form, in the absence of any gift thereof by the husband to the wife, remained his separate property. It is true that "property conveyed to the wife, but paid for by the husband, is prima facie a gift from him to her" (Pitkin v. Mott, 56 Mo. App. 401; Richardson v. Lowry, 67 Mo. 414); and the presumption is that such conveyance is made as a provision for and settlement upon the wife for her own benefit, and not as a resulting trust for the husband (Ilgenfritz v. Ilgenfritz, 116 Mo. 435, 22 S. W. 786). But this presumption is not conclusive and may be overcome by evidence that the gift to the wife or separate provision for her was not so made. Schuster v. Schuster, 93 Mo. 438, 6 S. W. 259. Evidence of declarations and of acts of the wife is competent to show that the intention of the parties was that the wife should hold for the husband, and the finding of the jury as to the fact is conclusive. It was so held in Seibold v. Christman, 75 Mo. 308, affirming 7 Mo. App. 254, wherein, at page 256, the court said:

> "Though upon the trial parol evidence was introduced to prove the intention of Charles Seibold and his wife, there is here no question of an express trust proved by parol. As the evidence tended to show that the lot was purchased with the money of one person, and the legal title taken in the name of another, there was the usual implication of a resulting trust. Coming more closely to the facts, it appears to be the case of a husband causing the deed to be taken in the name of his wife, and thus the usual presumption of a resulting trust is rebutted, and a prima facie case made out that the husband intended the conveyance to be a provision for his wife. This prima facie case may, however, in its turn, be rebutted by evidence, establishing the fact that it was the intention of the parties that the wife should hold for the husband; and this fact the jury here found. * * * There was ample evidence to sustain the finding of the jury; nor was there any error in the instructions given. The presumption of a provision for the wife was rebutted, and the ordinary implication of equity prevailed of a trust resulting for the benefit of the person who paid the consideration-money for the land. The evidence was competent, not as creating a trust by parol, but as showing the intention of the parties at the time. * * * Nor is it for the plaintiffs to object to matters which go to the weight of evidence, after the whole case was submitted to a jury without objection on their part."

It often has been declared that the evidence of an implied or resulting trust, such as that claimed by the cross-complainant in this case, "must be clear, strong, unequivocal and so definite and positive as to leave no room for doubt in the mind of the chancellor." Curd v. Brown, 148 Mo. 82, 49 S. W. 990. But the determination of the fact is primarily with the judge who tried the case.

> "It is clear that there can be no executed gift in the absence of any intention to give on the part of the donor. It is true that the facts and circumstances of a transaction may be such as to practically compel the conclusion that a gift was intended, and to render worthless any subsequent statement to the contrary on the part of the donor. But no such effect, we are satisfied, must necessarily be given to the mere fact that, in the case of the purchase of real property with community funds, the husband has directed that the deed shall run to the wife as grantee. There is nothing in the nature of such a fact that renders it consistent only with the theory of gift, and other facts and circumstances may so tend to show another reason than the desire and intent to make a gift as to furnish ample warrant for a conclusion that no gift was intended, and therefore that there has been no 'executed gift.'" Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 282, 104 Pac. 308, 310.

And in an action of this character, involving on one side the claimed right to a divorce and on the other side claims of property rights by the husband, the court is entitled to consider all of the evidence, including that upon the cause of action for divorce, in determining the weight of evidence and the credibility of the parties as witnesses. Della v. Della, 98 Ark. 540, 136 S. W. 927.

[1] In this case it is not necessary to set forth an abstract of the evidence concerning the disposition made from time to time by these parties of money acquired by the husband and held in possession by the wife as bank credits, or held in the form of investments made in her name. This evidence is included in several hundreds of pages of transcript containing the testimony of sundry witnesses. The defendant testified (contrary to plaintiff's testimony) that he did not make a gift of the money to plaintiff, and did not intend any such gift, and that he never stated that he was making or had made any such gift. The circumstances relating to the various transactions were extensively developed by testimony of witnesses and by documentary evidence. That there is a substantial conflict in the evidence cannot successfully be denied. That there is much evidence inconsistent with the theory of a gift of these funds or their proceeds by the husband to the wife is also clear from the record. We are of opinion that the facts found by the trial court after hearing this conflicting evidence should be accepted by us as the facts in the case, and that we would not be justified in disturbing these findings. An appellate court "will not disturb the finding of the trial court where there is substantial evidence warranting a clear and satisfactory conviction to that effect." Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 474, 484, 111 Pac. 360, 364.

[2] It being thus established that the cross-complainant was the equitable owner of the money and property in question in the state of Missouri at the time that it was transferred to the state of California, it retained that character as his separate property in California; it being further shown that in connection with the investments in California there was no gift made to the plaintiff of the property purchased here. Estate of Burrows, 136 Cal. 113, 68 Pac. 488.

[3] Appellant claims that the court erred in overruling her objections to certain testimony of the witness Hermina White concerning conversations of date prior to 1904 between plaintiff and defendant (who were her mother and father) about the investment of money in property at St. Louis. The objection was based upon the fact that the allegations of the cross-complaint limited to the years 1904, 1905, and 1906 the claim of cross-complainant that he had intrusted these moneys to the plaintiff. But it appears that the plaintiff had previously testified to the receipt of moneys as gifts from the defendant during years prior to 1904, and that the property here in question was in part the result of investments of that money. On that state of the record the testimony objected to was correctly admitted.

Assuming that the court erred in permitting L. D. White to testify to certain statements made by Mr. Brunner to Mrs. White out of the presence of Mrs. Brunner, and further erred in permitting defendant's counsel to ask leading questions of the witness Sheitlein, we think that the errors so committed are of minor importance in relation to the entire case and do not appreciably affect the merits.

Counsel for appellants present in their brief an argument based upon a supposed appeal from an order made by the superior court vacating and setting aside an earlier order of that court requiring the payment of alimony pendente lite. The transcript fails to show any appeal taken from that order, and it is not involved in the appeal from the judgment. For that reason no ruling is made upon the question presented.

The judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Marian Baker Sutton and another, legatees under the last will of Mary M. Baker, deceased, appeal from a decree of final distribution. Affirmed.

Gurney E. Newlin and Roy V. Reppy, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. E. E. Leighton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by Marian Baker Sutton and Belle A. Baker, legatees under the last will of deceased, from the decree of final distribution in the matter of her estate, the court below having refused to award them therein any portion of the estate of deceased. The ground of the court's action was that certain transactions had by deceased with said legatees operated as ademptions of their legacies.

By her will executed July 24, 1902, deceased gave to each of said appellants, who were nieces of her deceased husband, $500. The will also provided for several other small legacies. Appellants resided in Boulder, Colo. In February, 1911, the First National Bank of Palo Alto issued a certificate of deposit payable to the order of deceased for $408, with interest from February 8, 1911, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum if left for six months—no interest after maturity. On February 17, 1911, deceased wrote to Mr. M. A. Buchan, president of said bank, as follows:

"Those nieces in Boulder have been ill and are all alone and nothing but their earnings to go for their support so I must try to help them if possible."

On July 8, 1911, deceased wrote a letter to appellants in which she said:

> "I have been thinking all the morning about you two dear girls and how hard you both have to struggle along if your expenses are anywhere as expensive as ours are and you have to work so hard. Well I wish I dare do for you as I have been thinking I would. I have a $400 certificate on the First National Bank of Palo Alto which I would sign over to you both to put in your bank as your own to draw interest my lifetime or while I live, unless I go broke and have to have it back, and you never need tell any one about it or break it until after I pass away, then you would be sure of a little of your uncle's money. I would give you full instructions how you would do with the bank and tell Mr. Buchan, the president of the First National Bank, about it. Of course, I have mentioned you in my will. My money goes out so fast I often feel I may outlive it and if I do have to go to you and if it was not for Sister Adelia, I would any way and we would use what I have together."

On July 22, 1911, she wrote another letter to appellants, in which she made the following statement:

> "So in view of what may happen I am going to send you a piece of pink paper by name a certificate of the First National Bank of Palo Alto, Mr. M. A. Buchan, president and first cashier. It is at four per cent interest and has to be sent to the bank to be renewed every six months from the time of date. I will send it over to you * * * and rather than have you break or use any of it only the interest I would rather you would ask me for help some other way."

On July 24, 1911, deceased indorsed on the back of the certificate the following: "Mary M. Baker sign this certificate to Miss Belle Baker and Mrs. Marian Baker Sutton of Boulder, Colorado"—and on the said date, or within a few days thereafter delivered the certificate thus indorsed to the appellants.

Mr. Buchan testified that he received from deceased a letter dated July 28, 1911, written by her, which informed him of the assignment of the $408 certificate, and in her letter she made the following condition:

> "That she was placing the certificate with her late husband's nieces, Marian Baker Sutton and Belle A. Baker, during her lifetime, to be renewed every six months as long as she should live unless she should get broke and need it, and they must not break the principal. That she wished to make sure of the small amount to be given Belle A. Baker and Marian Baker Sutton, her Boulder nieces, in case they should ever need it, and that she had sent it to them, together with directions how to proceed, and that they should send it to M. A. Buchan for renewal."

At the expiration of the six months for which the $408 certificate was made the same was sent to the bank by appellants for renewal, and a new certificate was issued by the bank in the place thereof for $408, dated August 8, 1911, which certificate recited that Marian Baker had deposited in the bank $408 payable to the order of Belle A. Baker and Marian B. Sutton at the death of Mrs. Mary M. Baker and to be renewed every six months after date and to bear interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum. After the expiration of six months from August 8, 1911, a new certificate was issued in renewal, which last-named certificate was paid to appellant some four months after the death of deceased. Subsequently, the date not appearing, deceased wrote to Marian B. Sutton as follows:

> "I am thinking I will let you have a $600 certificate on the same agreement of the $400, not to use any of it which will make the $1000 I intend will be yours and Belle's after I am gone. No one will ever know anything about it only M. A. Buchan."

On April 11, 1912, deceased wrote to Buchan the following:

> "I remember I had thought of sending this $600.00 to my Boulder nieces the same as I did the $400.00 and let them keep it my lifetime and draw the interest unless I live long enough to need it. They must not draw the principal while I live, making them sure of the $1000.00 I intend they would have if they outlive me."

On June 11, 1912, deceased again wrote to M. A. Buchan, saying:

> "I am writing to ask a favor in regard to sending another certificate to my Boulder nieces. * * * I want to make them even $1000 on the same terms as the $400 certificates they already have as that amount is what I am intending they shall have if they outlive me, and if what I have of my own does not last me I am to have it back with the proviso: that if I do have that when I draw it they may draw an equal amount to use as they are a mind to."

In response to the requests in these letters, Buchan on June 14, 1912, issued a certificate of deposit of said bank for $600, the certificate reciting that Mrs. Baker has deposited in this bank $600, payable to the order of Belle A. Baker and Mrs. Marian B. Sutton at the death of Mrs. Baker, with interest from May 29, 1912, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. On July 27, 1911, deceased executed a codicil to her will, appointing her nephew, Robert B. Emery, executor thereof, and revoking the appointment of P. H. Atkinson as executor made by the original will. Deceased died July 11, 1912, being at that time of about the age of 85 years. The bank paid the amount of the $600 certificate to the appellants in December, 1912.

The lower court found that by the letters of the testatrix she expressed her intention that the certificates of deposit should be in ademption and satisfaction of the legacies to appellants, and that appellants are not entitled to any further moneys or properties of the estate.

Section 1351 of the Civil Code provides:

> "Advancements or gifts are not to be taken as ademptions of general legacies, unless such intention is expressed by the testator in writing."

The question in this case is whether such an intention is sufficiently expressed by the deceased in the writings to which we have referred. We are of the opinion that this question must be answered in the affirmative. Of course, the requirements of section 1351, Civil Code, are satisfied if the intention there referred to is fairly shown by the writings of the deceased, taken in connection with the circumstances under which such writings were made. We have here a will by which appellants were given $500 each, or $1,000 in all, and various other small legacies were provided for. It is quite apparent from her letters that deceased was continually in fear that she might exhaust the greater part of her property, if not all of it, before she died, and that she was very desirous that appellants should be preferred to all the other legatees in the event that the estate left by her was not sufficient in amount to pay all. She desired them to have as much as possible of the amount bequeathed, from the property left her by their uncle, if she did not require it for her own use during her own life. So she put the certificate of deposit for $408 in appellants' possession, indorsed to them, with the condition expressed and understood by all parties, including the bank, that the principal of the same should not be paid to them during her lifetime, but only the interest thereon, and that she was to have the certificate back if she needed it for her own expenses of living. The condition as to the payment of the principal was incorporated in each of the renewal certificates. Her idea, as expressed in her letter of July 8, 1911, to appellants, was that they would thus be "sure of a little of" their uncle's money, and, as expressed in her letter of July 28, 1911, to Mr. Buchan, that she wished "to make sure of the small amount to be given" to appellants. Taken alone, the evidence as to this transaction of the year 1911 relative to the $408 certificate may not sufficiently show an intention that the amount to be received thereunder should be in satisfaction pro tanto of the legacies to appellants of $500 each, but when considered in connection with the evidence as to the later transaction in the year 1912, the intention as to both transactions is beyond serious question sufficiently shown. We think that under the circumstances it may properly be so considered. She wrote appellant Marian B. Sutton, "I am thinking I will let you have a $600 certificate on the same agreement of the $400, not to use any of it which will make the $1000 I intend will be yours and Belle's after I am gone," and she wrote Mr. Buchan:

> "I remember I had thought of sending this $600.00 to my Boulder nieces the same as I did the $400. * * * They must not draw the principal while I live, making them sure of the $1000.00 I intend they would have if they outlive me."

And again to Mr. Buchan:

> "I want to make them even $1000 on the same terms as the $400 certificates they already have as that amount is what I am intending they shall have if they outlive me."

The intention was manifest that appellants should have the amount that she intended to give them by her will so placed that they would get it at her death, whatever the condition of her estate might be, and appellants received the $600 certificate with that intention as to both certificates clearly expressed to them. There is nothing in any of the writings of deceased or in the evidence that is necessarily inconsistent with our conclusion.

We do not consider it necessary to discuss here any other suggestion or claim made in the briefs. Whether or not the money evidenced by the certificates belonged at the death of deceased to the estate rather than to appellants appears to be immaterial here. The bank has in fact paid the money to appellants, and the executor has acquiesced in such payment as one in effect made from the estate; the ground of his opposition to any distribution of further money to appellants being that they have thus received the $1,000 to which they were entitled under the will.

The decree appealed from is affirmed.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 688*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1504, providing that a judgment against an executor on a claim shall only establish the claim as if allowed by the executor, and section 1636, providing that the allowance of a claim may be contested, a judgment against an executor on a claim did not estop the residuary legatee from contesting the claim on settlement of the executor's account; a judgment on a claim against an estate for money being an exception to the rule, under section 1582, that a judgment against an executor in enumerated actions, including actions founded on contract, concludes legatees.

3. TRIAL (§ 330*)—GENERAL VERDICT—INCONSISTENT ISSUES.

A judgment on a general verdict within Code Civ. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

A claim presented by A. F. Rooker against the estate of William Hellier, deceased, was contested by Catherine Hellier, and from a judgment declaring the claim invalid and denial of a new trial, claimant appeals. Affirmed.

Roger Johnson and R. P. Henshall, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Lewis F. Byington, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, C. J. Appeal from judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco declaring invalid the claim of A. F. Rooker against the estate of William Hellier, deceased.

William Hellier died testate. His daughter, Catherine Hellier, was named in his will as residuary legatee. A. F. Rooker in due time presented to the executor of the will of deceased a claim against his estate for the sum of $5,000, with interest. The claim was based on a promissory note for that amount payable to Rooker and purporting to bear the signatures of G. S. Switzer and William Hellier. The executor rejected the claim. Thereafter Rooker commenced an action in the superior court against the executor to establish the claim. Upon trial before a jury in that action Rooker was awarded a verdict for the full amount of the note, with interest. Judgment upon the verdict was accordingly entered. On appeal by the executor the judgment was affirmed. After issuance of the remittitur Rooker applied to the lower court for an order requiring the executor to pay the judgment. His application was contested by the residuary legatee, Catherine Hellier, who filed written objections to the claim. Her contest raised substantially the same issues as were raised and determined in the action brought by Rooker against the executor to establish his claim. These issues were as follows: (1) That the note in question was not signed by the testator or by any one with his authority; (2) that the note was a forgery; (3) that no consideration was received for the note; (4) that if the note had been executed the testator paid the same before his death. On the trial before a jury Rooker introduced in evidence the judgment roll in the case brought by him against the executor, the judgment rendered by the appellate court in his favor, the remittitur from that court, and an account of the executor approved and settled after the appellate court had affirmed the judgment. Accompanying the account introduced in evidence was a statement of the claims against the estate, in which the executor declared that he "rejected this claim [referring to the Rooker claim] and has contested the same and will contest the same until the final determination thereof, upon the ground that he does not believe it to be a charge against the estate." On behalf of the contestant evidence was presented to the jury tending to prove that the note was never executed by the testator or by his authority. The claimant introduced evidence in rebuttal. The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the contestant. Following the verdict judgment was entered in her favor adjudging the claim invalid, and that the claimant have and recover nothing thereon or upon the prior judgment based on said claim. Thereafter the claimant moved for a new trial, which was denied. From the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial he appealed.

[1] The appellant takes the position that the judgment recovered by him against the executor establishing the validity of his claim was final and conclusive and bound all parties interested in the estate, including the contestant. This position is untenable. A judgment establishing the validity of a claim has no other or greater effect than the allowance of a claim by an executor or administrator and judge of the superior court. Having the right to attack the validity of any claim approved by an executor or administrator and judge, a legatee under a will of a testator has the same right to attack a claim the validity of which has been established by final judgment.

> "A judgment rendered against an executor or administrator, upon any claim for money against the estate of his testator or intestate, only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and the judge," etc. Section 1504, Code Civ. Proc.

Until a claim has been passed upon on settlement of an account or rendition of an exhibit, or in making a decree of sale, whether the claim be one approved by the executor or administrator and the judge, or one established after rejection by a final judgment, it may be contested by the heirs or legatees.

> "All matters, including allowed claims not passed upon on the settlement of any former account, or on rendering an exhibit, or on making a decree of sale, may be contested by the heirs, for cause shown. * * * Whenever an allowed claim is contested by any heir, or other person entitled to contest it, either the contestant or claimant is entitled to a trial by jury of the issues of fact presented by the contest," etc. Section 1636, Code Civ. Proc.

The claim of Rooker had not been passed upon on settlement of any account or on the rendition of any exhibit or in any decree of sale, and was therefore subject to attack as in the manner provided in section 1636, Code of Civil Procedure. The plain language of these sections, 1504 and 1636, has been repeatedly construed in accordance with the unmistakable intent therein expressed. In Hall v. Cayot, 141 Cal. 13, 74 Pac. 299, this court said:

> "The sole object of an action upon a rejected claim for money is to place it among the allowed claims against the estate. A judgment rendered against an executor or administrator upon any claim for money against the deceased only establishes a claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and the judge, * * * and such a judgment is no more effectual as an estoppel than an allowance of the claim would be, for it can be contested by the heirs on settlement of an account in the same manner as a claim allowed by an executor or administrator and judge can be contested. Code Civ. Proc. § 1636."

To the same effect see Estate of More, 121 Cal. 635, 54 Pac. 148; Haub v. Leggett, 160 Cal. 491, 117 Pac. 556; Estate of Schroeder, 46 Cal. 315; Estate of Wiley, 138 Cal. 301–306, 71 Pac. 441; Estate of Glenn, 74 Cal. 567, 16 Pac. 396; Shivley v. Harris, 5 Cal. App. 513, 90 Pac. 971; Shiels v. Nathan, 12 Cal. App. 605–615, 108 Pac. 34. We must hold, in accordance with the plain letter of the law, and consistently with the decisions in the cases cited, supra, that the contestant, respondent herein, was not bound by the judgment recovered by Rooker against the executor, and that she had the same right to contest his claim as if the same had been allowed by the executor and judge and no judgment had been recovered thereon by the claimant.

[2] Appellant contends, with apparent earnestness, that under section 1582, Code of Civil Procedure, and decisions of this court construing that section, the judgment obtained by Rooker against the executor bound the legatee. That section reads as follows:

> "Actions for the recovery of any property, real or personal, or for the possession thereof, or to quiet title thereto, or to determine any adverse claim thereon, and all actions founded upon contracts, may be maintained by and against executors and administrators in all cases in which the same might have been maintained by or against their respective testators or intestates."

This section has been construed by this court in actions to foreclose mortgages, to quiet title, in ejectment, etc., and the decisions construing the section all hold that in the cases enumerated therein a judgment rendered against an executor or administrator concludes heirs, legatees, and devisees. The principal case upon which appellant relies is McCaughey v. Lyall, 152 Cal. 615, 93 Pac. 681. In that case this court held that in an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by an intestate the administrator was the only necessary party defendant; that the judgment against the administrator concluded the heirs of the intestate and that a foreclosure sale under the judgment divested them of their interest in his estate. While section 1582, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that "all actions founded upon contracts" may be maintained by and against executors and administrators in all cases in which the same might have been maintained by or against their respective testators or intestates, sections 1504 and 1636, Code of Civil Procedure, qualify the effect of a judgment recovered against an executor or administrator in an action to establish the validity of a claim for money. The three sections must be construed together. Sections 1504 and 1636, Code of Civil Procedure, deal with one particular subject only, i. e., "claims for money against an estate." Section 1582 is general in character and applies to a number of subjects, including "all actions founded upon contracts." It is a well-settled rule of statutory construction that a general provision of the law must be controlled by one that is special. Sections 1504 and 1636, Code of Civil Procedure, applicable only to judgments based upon claims "for money against an estate," in so far as they qualify the effect of such judgments, must be held to control the provisions of section 1582 as construed by this court in the cases cited by appellants. In other words, we must hold that by reason of sections 1504 and 1636 of the Code of Civil Procedure a judgment on a claim against an estate for money is an exception to the rule resulting from the provisions of section 1582, Code of Civil Procedure, that a judgment against an executor or administrator in the actions enumerated in that section, including actions "founded upon contract," concludes the legatees, devisees, and heirs of testators and intestates.

[3, 4] It is urged by appellant that the verdict was uncertain and inconsistent, by reason of the inconsistency of the issues claimed by him to have been submitted to the jury, and for that reason he contends that the judgment should be reversed. Undoubtedly, the issue as to the genuineness of the note was inconsistent with the issue that no consideration was received therefor and the issue that if the note had been executed the testator paid the same before his death. But the verdict was general, one which is declared by section 624, Code of Civil Procedure, to be pronounced "generally upon all or any of the issues either in favor of the plaintiff or defendant." The jury by its verdict decided upon at least one of the issues in favor of the contestant. The bill of exceptions does not purport to contain all of the evidence introduced upon the trial. The only evidence in behalf of contestant that does appear in the record relates to the issue involving the genuineness of the note in question. Appellant does not contend that the evidence presented to the jury was insufficient to justify the verdict against him on that issue. On his motion for a new trial he did not rely on the insufficiency of the evidence. The bill of exceptions contains no specifications of particulars wherein he claims that the evidence was insufficient, and in his opening brief he admits that "the sufficiency of the evidence is not before the court." We must therefore conclusively presume that the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict upon the only issue in support of which the record shows the contestant offered proofs.

[5, 6] The contestant, defending against the note, had the right to set up inconsistent defenses and offer evidence in support thereof. Upon demand of the claimant the court might have submitted special issues to the jury, if evidence in support of inconsistent issues had been introduced. But he made no such demand. He was apparently satisfied to take his chances upon a general verdict. The verdict being against him, he cannot now be heard to complain. Where several issues are tried and submitted to the jury, the general verdict must stand, if the evidence upon one issue alone is sufficient to sustain the verdict. Crosett v. Whelan, 44 Cal. 200; In re Sanderson, 74 Cal. 199, 208, 15 Pac. 753; Verdelli v. Gray's Harbor Commission Co., 115 Cal. 517, 525, 47 Pac. 364, 778.

A number of other points are urged by appellant in support of his appeal, but they do not warrant a reversal, and we do not consider them of sufficient importance to require discussion here.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BORGES v. DUNHAM. (S. F. 7132.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 29, 1914.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 544*) — Record — Bill of Exceptions.

An appeal, taken under the old method from an order appointing a receiver to collect the rents of the property in controversy, in a suit to set aside a deed conveying the same, is ineffectual for purpose of review, where the record contains no bill of exceptions showing what papers were used or evidence introduced on motion for a receiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2412-2415, 2417-2420, 2422-2426, 2428, 2478, 2479; Dec. Dig. § 544.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 634*)—Record—Bill of Exceptions.

Though, on appeal from an order appointing a receiver, taken under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a-953c, providing for the preparation of papers on appeal, jurisdiction of the court on appeal is acquired by the filing of notice of appeal in the trial court, yet, where a mere inspection of the record shows that appellant is not entitled to any relief, the court, in response to the motion to dismiss, will affirm the order.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by Joseph F. Borges against Ida J. Dunham, sometimes known as Ida J. Borges. From an order appointing a receiver, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harold Ide Cruzan and E. L. Webber, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, C. J. Motion to dismiss appeal from order appointing receiver.

Plaintiff brought an action in the superior court of Napa county to cancel a deed which he had executed and delivered to the defendant and for an accounting of the rents and profits derived from the land described in the deed. Defendant answered, denying specifically the material allegations of the complaint, and with her answer filed a cross-complaint, in which she sued to quiet her title to the land in controversy. After issue joined, plaintiff, pursuant to notice given to the defendant, moved the trial court for an order appointing a receiver to receive the rents, issues, and profits of the real property involved in the action. The motion was noticed for the day set for the trial, and, as stated in the notice of motion, was based "upon all the papers, files, records, and proceedings in said action, and upon all the evidence that may be received at said trial, and upon further evidence to be introduced in support of the motion." At the trial, and after some testimony had been taken, the court granted plaintiff's motion and appointed a receiver. From the order appointing the receiver, defendant appealed. Plaintiff now moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the appellant has failed to present a record upon which the order appealed from can be reviewed.

The transcript on appeal contains no bill of exceptions. It contains a copy of the following papers and records: The pleadings; notice of motion for appointment of receiver; minutes reciting that the trial of the action was commenced, that a witness was sworn and testified, and that plaintiff's motion for the appointment of a receiver was granted; the order appointing the receiver, his bond and oath; notice of appeal and undertaking thereon. Appended to the transcript is a stipulation signed by counsel for respondent (reserving all objections to the record), wherein he agrees that the transcript contains a full, true, and correct copy of all the papers therein set forth now on file in the office of the county clerk of Napa county, and that the minutes therein contained are full, true, and correct copies thereof. There is also included in the transcript a certificate signed by the clerk, in which he certifies the correctness of the copies of the papers and minutes contained in the transcript.

[1, 2] Not only is there no bill of exceptions, but there is nothing in the record indicating that any of the papers, copies of which are contained in the transcript, were used on the hearing of the motion, nor is there a statement of any testimony given in support of the motion or at the trial of the case. If we consider the appeal as taken under the old method, it is ineffectual for the purposes of review, because it contains no bill of exceptions showing what papers were used or what evidence was introduced on the motion. If we consider the appeal as taken under the provisions of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, the appeal is abortive, because appellant, after filing notice of appeal, took no further steps under those Code sections to procure a record to be used on appeal. For the reasons stated, it is impossible, with the record before us, to review the order appointing the receiver. As the filing of the notice of appeal in the court below, treating the appeal as taken under the new method, conferred jurisdiction upon this court, and as a mere inspection of the record shows that appellant is entitled to no relief, the proper order for this court to make in response to the motion to dismiss is to affirm the order appointing a receiver. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Doran, 161 Cal. 118, 118 Pac. 526.

It is therefore ordered that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.

SLOSS, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to a tract of land in Kings county. He also appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff claims as successor in interest of Arney L. Weddle, to whom the land was granted by a United States patent on March 7, 1892. The defendant claims under a tax deed, and also relies upon a title by prescription and the statute of limitations.

[1, 2] The plaintiff showed a good deraignment of title from Weddle. The record contains reference to a deed from Lucinda E. Weddle (wife of Arney L.) to Arna L. Weddle. The deed was intended to convey any possible interest of the wife to the husband. Waiving the question of the effect of the mistake in the grantee's name, there is nothing to show that the wife had any interest, and, so far as the proof goes, Arney L. Weddle was the sole owner of the land. Even if it was community property, he had the right to convey it for a valuable consideration. He did convey it to Frederick in 1907 by a deed reciting such consideration. Thereafter the plaintiff obtained a money judgment against Frederick, had execution levied, and purchased the property at the execution sale. The sheriff's deed was executed to the plaintiff on December 12, 1909. The evidence offered by plaintiff in this behalf consisted of the judgment against Frederick, the execution, with the sheriff's return showing the sale, and the affidavit showing due publication of notice of sale, and the sheriff's deed in proper form. These papers were sufficient to show the acquisition by plaintiff of Frederick's title. Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 649, 99 Am. Dec. 441; Hihn v. Peck, 30 Cal. 280; Peterson v. Weissbein, 75 Cal. 174, 16 Pac. 769.

[3, 4] The land was sold to the state for nonpayment of taxes in 1895. The tax collector made his deed to the state in 1900. The property was offered for sale and sold to the defendant on May 5, 1905, and a deed was thereafter executed. At the time of the sale section 3897 of the Political Code had been amended by adding certain requirements regarding the notice of sale by the state of property which had been sold to it for nonpayment of taxes. One of these requirements was that a copy of the notice should be mailed to the party to whom the land was last assessed at his last known post office address. By the terms of section 3898 the deed of the tax collector was required to "recite the fact necessary to authorize such sale and conveyance." This requirement of mailing notice applied to sales had after the amended section went into effect, even though, as here, the publication of notice had been commenced before such mailing was essential. Buck v. Canty, 162 Cal. 226, 121 Pac. 924. Such mailing was one of the facts necessary to authorize the tax collector to make the sale. Smith v. Furlong, 160 Cal. 522, 117 Pac. 527. The deed in this case did not recite the mailing of notice. It was not, therefore, the deed provided for by section 3898. Canty v. Staley, 162 Cal. 379, 123 Pac. 252.

[5] But, if compliance with the requirement of mailing could be shown, although not recited, the burden of proof is on the party claiming under the deed (Buck v. Canty, 162 Cal. 226, 121 Pac. 924; Krotzer v. Douglas, 163 Cal. 49, 124 Pac. 722; Davis v. Peck, 165 Cal. 353, 132 Pac. 438), and, as this burden was not sustained by the defendant, the court rightly ruled that he had not acquired title by virtue of the tax proceedings.

[6, 7] The questions arising on the pleas of the statute of limitations and of prescriptive title may be considered together. Plaintiff having shown title in himself, he was presumed to have been in possession within the time required by law, and the presumption could be overcome only by proof that the property had been held and possessed adversely to the legal title for five years, before the commencement of the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 321; Nathan v. Dierssen, 146 Cal. 62, 79 Pac. 739. The plea of the statute of limitations would therefore not be sustained unless the defendant showed adverse possession for the same period necessary to the acquisition of a prescriptive title. The court found against defendant's allegations in this regard. We think this finding is amply supported by the evidence. The defendant testified that in May, 1905, he went on the land, measured it off, and placed stakes at the corners. He was on the land at that time during parts of two days. In the fall of 1905 he rented it for the purpose of feeding sheep. He rented it similarly during the succeeding years up to 1912, receiving a total rental of about $50 for five years. He saw sheep feeding on the land several times. His testimony was somewhat qualified by the later statement that he gave no written lease, but merely charged and collected money "for the feed of the sheep on the land." The first transaction of this kind was between September and November, 1905. The action was commenced in August, 1910.

The court was entirely justified in concluding that the defendant had not proven an exclusive and continuous possession sufficient to satisfy the statute. While possession may be maintained by using the land for pasture during the grazing season (Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 11, 15 Pac. 431), even though there be no inclosure (Bullock v. Rouse, 81 Cal. 595, 22 Pac. 919), the possession must be of an exclusive character. The proof here was silent on the question of occupancy by others and was entirely consistent with the view that the possession of those holding under Canty was casual and intermittent. Besides, this possession, such as it was, began in the fall of 1905, less than five years before the commencement of the action. It was not unreasonable for the court to conclude that the formal act of marking corners in May, 1905, if it was a taking of possession, was not connected with the later renting of the feeding rights so as to make the possession continuous between May, 1905, and the autumn of the same year.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

COOK v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (L. A. 3431.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION ON DAMAGES.

In an action for personal injuries in a collision between plaintiff's automobile and a street car, where it was undisputed that plaintiff suffered some injury, so that the verdict for defendant could have been reached only upon a finding of plaintiff's own negligence or defendant's want of negligence, any error in an instruction that, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, the physicians attending plaintiff could not testify without his consent, and that from his failure to call them or the nurse as witnesses to the extent of his injury the law presumed that their testimony would have been against him, was harmless.

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 81*)—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—SPEED OF STREET CAR.

There is no arbitrary or set limit of speed for street cars, but negligence as to speed depends upon whether the car was being run at a speed beyond that which would be employed by one exercising ordinary care.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the complaint charged that defendant's street car was being negligently run at 30 miles an hour, and the court correctly charged as to defendant's negligence in that respect, an instruction that there was no allegation or proof as to any ordinance limiting the rate of speed at the place of collision, if outside the issues, was not prejudicial, where it was not claimed that there was any limit fixed by ordinance.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and Norman Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff as the result of a collision between an automobile driven by him and an electric street car of the defendant. There was a jury trial and a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant.

The testimony on the issues of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence was sharply conflicting, and no question is made of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. While it was shown without contradiction that the plaintiff had suffered some physical injuries, there was a good deal of controversy over the extent of these injuries, the defendant claiming that plaintiff was greatly exaggerating their severity. After the accident, the plaintiff was taken to a hospital. There he was attended by two physicians. He also had the care of a nurse. None of these three persons was produced as a witness.

[1] The court gave an instruction in which, after stating that, by reason of the privilege defined in section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the physicians who had attended plaintiff could not testify without his consent, it charged that if plaintiff had failed to call them as witnesses, and showed no reason for such failure, the law presumed that their testimony would have been against him. A like presumption was declared to arise from the unexplained failure to call the nurse. These instructions are assigned as error. So far, at least, as the physicians are concerned, the instruction given is in conflict with the views expressed in Thomas v. Gates, 126 Cal. 1, 58 Pac. 315, where it is said, in effect, that the raising of a presumption against a party for the failure to introduce or to permit the introduction of testimony which he had the right to exclude as privileged, would go far toward destroying the value of the privilege. But of this instruction, as well as the one relating to the nurse, it is sufficient to say that, if they were erroneous, they were not prejudicial. They dealt with witnesses who could have testified on no subject other than that of the extent of the plaintiff's injuries. As has been said, the fact that he had suffered some injuries was undisputed. The verdict in favor of defendant could therefore have been reached only upon a finding that, by reason of plaintiff's own negligence or the defendant's want of negligence, there was no liability for the injuries, whatever their extent. In this state of the record, errors in instructions bearing solely on the amount of damage could not have influenced the verdict, and present no ground for reversal. Wilhelm v. Donegan, 143 Cal. 50, 76 Pac. 713.

[2, 3] Only one other point is made. It is claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury that there was no allegation or evidence of any ordinance limiting the rate of speed at which defendant might propel its cars at the place where the collision occurred, "and defendant had a right to drive or propel its said car at any rate which it saw fit which was not inconsistent with the exercise of ordinary care." The complaint charged that the car was being negligently driven at a rate of speed of about 30 miles an hour. Whether the speed was in excess of a rate which, under all the circumstances, would be compatible with the exercise of due care, was therefore an issue in the case. The instruction informed the jury that there was no arbitrary or set limit of speed, but that they must determine whether the car was being run at a rate beyond that which would be employed by one exercising ordinary care. This was a correct statement of the obligation of the defendant so far as the speed of the car was concerned. The plaintiff was not prejudiced by the charge that there was no limit fixed by ordinance, since it is not pretended that there was any such limit. If this part of the instruction was outside of the issues, it could not have misled the jury in any way. See George v. L. A. Ry. Co., 126 Cal. 357, 361, 58 Pac. 819, 46 L. R. A. 829, 77 Am. St. Rep. 184. The case relied on by appellant in this behalf (Cooper v. L. A. Term. Ry. Co., 137 Cal. 229, 70 Pac. 11), does not support his contention. There a requested instruction had been refused, and the action of the trial court was sustained on the ground that the instruction was directed to facts not in issue. It does not follow, of course, that the same ground would have required a reversal, if the instruction had been given. Furthermore, the instruction in the Cooper Case was condemned on the additional ground, not applicable to the charge given here, that it would have taken from the consideration of the jury the question whether the rate of speed was in fact reckless.

The order is affirmed.

CARDOZA v. PILLSBURY et al. (S. F. 7262.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1915.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 250¾, New, vol. 16 Key-No. Series) — COMPENSATION — JURISDICTION OF INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION—JUDICIAL REVIEW.

An application for review of proceedings of the Industrial Accident Commission on the grounds that the findings of the Commission are not sustained by evidence, and that the applicant has new evidence, does not state grounds for review within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 317) § 84, but states grounds on which the Commission, under section 82, may grant a rehearing, and the application will be denied.

In Bank. Application for a writ of review by Joseph Cardoza against A. J. Pillsbury and others, constituting the Industrial Accident Commission, for a review of proceedings of the Commission. Denied.

Joseph Rafael, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE. The application for a review by this court of the proceedings of the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California states no ground upon which this court is authorized to entertain the same. The grounds stated—namely, that the findings of the Commission are not sustained by the evidence, and that the applicant has discovered new evidence material to him—are grounds upon which the Commission itself may grant a rehearing (section 82, Workmen's Compensation Act), but the courts are restricted to the grounds stated in section 84 of said act.

The application for a writ is denied for these reasons.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Application by Antonio Da Rosa Brazil and others for revocation of the probate of the will of Frank V. Silva, deceased. There was an order denying the application, and from the refusal of a new trial petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Everts & Ewing, of Fresno (H. P. Brown, of Fresno, of counsel), for appellants. James Gallagher, M. B. Harris, and E. M. Harris, all of Fresno, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The decedent, Frank V. Silva, died on March 22, 1912. On April 22, 1912, an order was made admitting a certain document to probate as his last will. Thereafter, within the time here allowed by law, the appellants filed a petition for the revocation of the probate of the will. After trial the court denied the revocation, the appellants moved for a new trial, and the court thereupon denied the motion. From this order the petitioners appeal. The decedent left no issue. The appellants are his brothers and sisters.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1, 2] The first point made in support of the appeal is that the document admitted to probate is not testamentary in character. The following is a copy of the paper:

> Fresno, July 2th, 1906.
> I leave all the Busines I got To my wife Luiza Rosa Silva so that she got to pai all my deads and wages of the working men and all the Bills that ivoe to be in Count ect.
>
> Frank V. Silva.
> Antone J. Breves
> Joe M. Silva

The appellants claim that the instrument does not describe any property, nor in any way refer to property so as to constitute a disposition thereof. We think, however, that this contention cannot be sustained. A will is always to be interpreted so as to prevent intestacy if such interpretation is reasonably possible. Civ. Code, § 1326. The courts are very liberal in construing words in a will written by one unfamiliar with the English language or unused to technical terms. Mitchell v. Donohue, 100 Cal. 208, 34 Pac. 614, 38 Am. St. Rep. 279. At the time this document was executed the decedent was very sick, and evidently believed that he would not live long. He announced his desire to make a will and of those present only Antone J. Breves was able to write English. All of them were Portuguese, unfamiliar with English. The decedent explained his intention to Breves, who thereupon prepared the above document. The use of the word "leave" is sufficient evidence of testamentary intent. The argument of the appellants is that the word "busines" cannot by any reasonable construction, be held to refer to property. The context shows that it was used to describe whatever property the decedent at that time possessed. Taking the document as a whole, it sufficiently indicates the purpose of the testator to devise and bequeath to his wife all the property that he possessed and to require her to pay all his debts. Antone J. Breves testified that the word "deads" was his mode of spelling the word "debts," that the word written "ivoe" was his method of writing the expression, "I owe" and that by the words "in Count" he meant "account." Whether these explanations were proper and competent or not we need not consider, for without them, in the light of the attending circumstances, the will should be given effect as if the words so used by him were properly written as he states they were intended to be.

[3, 4] The appellants next claim that there is no sufficient evidence of the execution of the document as a will. There was testimony to the effect that the decedent stated that he wished to make a will, and that he asked Antone J. Breves to write it, that Breves then wrote out the paper and handed it to the decedent, that decedent signed it and passed it back to Breves, who signed it as a witness, and that it was then handed to Joe M. Silva, who also signed as a witness. It does not appear that the testator in words asked that these persons sign as witnesses, or declared to them that the document was his will, but from the whole transaction as shown by the testimony it is very clear that all of them understood that he was promulgating the document as his will, that he desired these persons to sign the same as witnesses, and that they were signing in compliance with his desire so manifested by his manner and actions.

It is not necessary that the testator should have spoken words declaring the document to be his will, or that he should expressly request the witnesses to sign it as such. It is sufficient if this declaration and request are unmistakably indicated to the persons signing as witnesses by the testator's conduct and actions, although there is no declaration in words to that effect. The testimony leaves no doubt that the testator signed the document as his will, that he gave all persons present to understand that it was his will, and that he desired the subscribing witnesses to attest the same for the purpose of constituting it a will. Nothing more on this point is required by the statute. There is, it is true, much confusion and conflict in the testimony of the several witnesses with regard to the occurrences at the time of the execution of the will. This is not surprising, and indeed it was to be expected, since the persons present were called upon to testify in regard to the facts six years after they occurred. The law does not require that all the witnesses shall testify without conflict concerning the execution of the will, nor that at the time of the probate both of the subscribing witnesses shall testify to all the facts necessary to constitute a statutory execution thereof. There was sufficient evidence given to support the conclusion of the court that the facts occurred as above stated. There is therefore suffiicent evidence to support the finding that the will was duly executed.

[5] The appellants further claim that the court erred in refusing to admit evidence that the will was subsequently revoked. The evidence was properly rejected. The allegations of the appellants in their petition for revocation of probate were insufficient to justify the admission of evidence tending to show revocation. The Code provides that no written will can be revoked except, first, by a writing of the testator declaring such revocation, executed with the same formalities as a will, or, second, "by being burnt, torn, canceled, obliterated or destroyed, with the intent and for the purpose of revoking the same, by the testator himself, or by some person in his presence and by his direction." Civ. Code, § 1292. The allegations of the petition for revocation were to the effect that the wife of the decedent, respondent herein, some time after the execution of this will, was requested by the decedent to destroy the same; that thereupon in his presence she did destroy an envelope, declaring to the decedent at the time that the will was inclosed therein; that the decedent then believed that the said will was in the envelope and was then destroyed by burning the same; that from that time forward until his death he continued to believe that the said will had been destroyed; that in fact some other paper was inclosed in said envelope; that the will aforesaid was not destroyed or burned; and that all this was done by the said respondent for the purpose of deceiving the decedent and securing to herself the property left to her by said document. These acts did not, under the statutory provisions aforesaid, constitute a revocation of the will. In order to constitute such revocation, there must be an actual burning, tearing, canceling, obliteration, or destruction, with the intention to revoke the document as a will. The mere intent, unperformed, to destroy or burn the will is not sufficient. There must be a joint union of act and intent in order to accomplish the revocation. Estate of Olmsted, 122 Cal. 229, 54 Pac. 745; 1 Underhill on Wills, §§ 223–226; Boyd v. Cook, 3 Leigh (Va.) 32; Kent v. Mahaffey, 10 Ohio St. 204; Hise v. Fincher, 32 N. C. 139, 51 Am. Dec. 383; Clingan v. Mitchelltree, 31 Pa. 25; Mundy v. Mundy, 15 N. J. Eq. 290. The decisions in other states having no statute similar to section 1292 of our Civil Code are inapplicable here. In re Comassi, 107 Cal. 5, 40 Pac. 15, 28 L. R. A. 414. Inasmuch as there was no allegation to show revocation, it was not error to refuse evidence in support thereof.

[6] In a proceeding under the statute for the revocation of the probate of a will, the court cannot give relief for a fraudulent prevention of a revocation of the will. The statute does not provide for the presentation of such an issue as ground for revoking the admission to probate. If relief can be given at all for such a wrong, it must be sought by suit in equity to declare the wrongdoer a trustee for the heirs with respect to the property received by such wrongdoer in virtue of the will. 1 Underhill on Wills, § 153.

The last point urged by the appellants is that the court erred in giving the following instruction:

> "The court instructs you that it is not necessary that a testator should in words say that an instrument is his will or request the subscribing witnesses thereto to witness the same as such. Such statement and request on the part of the testator may be indicated by his manner, conduct or demeanor."

We see no error in this instruction. It is in accord with the law on the subject as we understand and have stated it to be.

[7] It was not error for the court to instruct the jury that it was immaterial whether the testator signed his name before or after the witnesses signed their names to the document executed as a will, if it appeared that all the parties signed it at the same time and as a part of the same transaction. The statute does not make the order of signing material. We find no other objections worthy of consideration.

The order denying new trial is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

John Rongo was convicted of second degree murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Julian & Gibbs, of Winters, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and A. G. Bailey, Dist. Atty., of Woodland, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree and was sentenced to imprisonment for the term of 25 years. His motion for a new trial was denied, and he took his appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial to the Court of Appeals. Owing to a disagreement of the justices of that court, the case was certified to this court.

[1] Upon appeal the first proposition presented is that the court erred in refusing to grant defendant's motion to dismiss the criminal charge on the ground that he had not been brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information. The information was filed on October 12, 1912. He was arraigned October 14th, and the time to plead was continued to October 16, 1912, on which day he pleaded not guilty, and the case was set for trial December 17, 1912. So far as the record shows, there was no objection made by defendant, on October 16th, to setting the case for trial on December 17th, although that date was beyond the 60-day limit. Consent will therefore be presumed. People v. Douglass, 100 Cal. 1, 34 Pac. 490; People v. Peter, 20 Cal. App. 151, 128 Pac. 415.

[2] Defendant moved for a dismissal on the above grounds, on December 16th. It appeared, at the hearing of the motion, that the district attorney was sick and unable to appear in court. Evidence was taken as to his physical condition which showed this to be the fact and that some days would elapse before he could safely undertake the trial of the case. A further continuance became necessary because the district attorney had no deputy and no attorney was available to take up the prosecution who had any knowledge of the facts. The court called attention to the fact that other cases were set for trial that would occupy all of December and would run into January. From the condition of the calendar and engagements of the court the judge stated that January 20, 1913, was "the earliest date this case could be continued to." The case was finally set for January 21st. No motion was made to dismiss after December 16th, and defendant went to trial on January 21st without further objection. The order was not error.

[3] It is next contended that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The homicide occurred in the evening of May 20, 1910. Upon that day the defendant, an Italian, and two of his countrymen—the deceased and a third man—met in Sacramento. They spent the better part of the day together, visiting saloons and drinking therein. The deceased paid for some of these drinks. In the afternoon they took the train to the town of Yolo, where they arrived at about half past 7 in the evening. Defendant carried a valise containing personal effects, which he left in the baggageroom of the railway station. The three men then left town, walking out on a public highway. The next morning the body of the deceased was found lying in the grass alongside of the traveled part of the highway. The ground gave evidence of a severe struggle and bore the marks of three distinct sets of footprints. Bruises and abrasions and incised wounds—the latter as though made with a knife—were found upon the head and body of the deceased, and in addition there was a punctured wound in the front of the body below the short ribs, which ranged upward and backward, passing entirely through the body, through the right lobe of the liver and the lower edge of the left lung. The hemorrhage resulting from this wound was the immediate cause of death. It was inflicted, according to the admissions of defendant, by a three-eighths inch iron bar or rod sharpened to a point which the third member of the party drove through the body of the deceased. Some small articles, a comb, and pocket pencil, were found lying in the grass and "ten cents, fifty cents, something like that," in money. No other money was found on the person of the deceased. The two men who were in company with deceased disappeared; this defendant abandoning his valise at the Yolo railway station. Two years afterward he was discovered, arrested, and put on trial for the murder. After his arrest he made a statement in substance as follows: He first met the third man, who he declares committed the murder, in Sacramento about a month before the day of the homicide. He did not know his name. On the morning of the homicide, the two met the deceased, and again in the afternoon. They drank together. Defendant did not notice any money in the possession of the deceased, saving one dollar, which deceased put upon a saloon counter to pay for a drink. The three together went to Yolo county, seeking work upon a ranch. They left the town in the evening for this purpose. The deceased and the third man quarreled on the train and again on the road. He did not know the cause of the quarrel, other than it was "some lady quarrel." They called each other vile names. They began to fight, and he saw the third man jab the deceased with the iron bar. Fearful of being implicated in the crime, he fled. Being ignorant of the English language and of American laws, he was in terror of arrest, and so abandoned his personal effects at the railway station, and walked all night, eventually going to Oregon.

A murder had been committed. Admittedly the defendant was present at the scene of the homicide. The condition of the ground bore evidence of a protracted struggle (the deceased was a powerful man). The wild oats and grasses were trampled down for a radius of 60 yards. Undoubtedly the defendant's own story exculpates him, but it was for the jury to say whether or not that story should be believed. The evidence was therefore sufficient to justify the verdict.

[4] The single proposition upon which the justices of the District Court of Appeal differed was over the admissibility of certain evidence offered and received by the court in an effort to establish a motive for the crime, which motive the prosecution asserted to be robbery. In its effort so to do, the prosecution offered, and the court received, the testimony of two witnesses, Nardini and Martinelli. Martinelli testified that he saw deceased about 1½ or 2 weeks before the homicide, and that he had about $180 with him. Nardini testified that he cashed a check for the deceased a few days previous to the homicide, and at that time the deceased had a purse under his vest which contained probably $200. Appellant's objection to the introduction of this evidence was overruled, and his motion to strike it out was denied. It is conceded, of course, that proof of motive, while never indispensible, is always permissible and often valuable. People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75; People v. Owens, 132 Cal. 469, 64 Pac. 770. The objection to this evidence, it is said, consists in this: That the time when it was shown that the deceased had money upon his person was too remote to give it any probative value in the case, and that it is not shown that the defendant knew that the deceased had this money. So the question is asked:

> "But how can the possession of money be evidence of a motive for robbery when the assailant has no knowledge of the fact?"

[5] But to this there is a twofold answer: First, the jury was not bound by the declaration of the defendant that he saw in the possession of the deceased only a silver dollar, and it would be a perfectly legitimate inference for the jury to draw that if the deceased did have any considerable sum of money upon the day of the homicide he may have exhibited it in one or another of the saloons or the railway ticket office; and the second answer is that to establish robbery as a motive it is not at all necessary that knowledge that the deceased had money should be brought home to the assailant. It is not required that thugs and highwaymen shall know that their victims' purses are well lined or lined at all. They commit their crimes for what the victims may chance to have upon their persons.

[6] Again, it is said that the last date upon which the deceased is shown to have money in his possession was too remote to give the evidence probative value, and therefore to render it admissible; it being argued that he might have spent all of that money between the date when last it was seen upon his person, and the date of the homicide. This is quite true. But the argument goes to the probative weight of the evidence, and not to its admissibility. Marable v. State, 89 Ga. 425, 15 S. E. 453; State v. Rice, 7 Idaho, 762, 66 Pac. 89; State v. Bailey, 79 Conn. 589, 65 Atl. 954; State v. Shelton (Mo. Sup.) 122 S. W. 736; Shumway v. State, 82 Neb. 152, 117 N. W. 407; Thurman v. Commonwealth, 107 Va. 912, 60 S. E. 99; Spates v. State, 62 Tex. Cr. R. 532, 138 S. W. 394.

[7] The proof of the fact that the deceased was in the habit of carrying money upon his person; that he had about $200 upon his person a few days before the homicide; that he had none when the body was discovered—affords strong evidence of motive, and there was no error in admitting the evidence.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

REHFUSS v. REHFUSS. (S. F. 6171.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 2, 1915.)

1. Divorce (§ 165*) — Interlocutory Judgment—"Excusable Neglect."

Where a husband, who was seeking divorce, represented to his wife that if she contested his charges and made countercharges their minor child would be given into the custody of a public institution and she could never see it, and her attorney corroborated him, her failure to oppose the suit was "excusable neglect," within Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing the vacation of judgments taken against a party through his excusable neglect.

2. Divorce (§ 165*)—Judgments—Vacation.

Where a wife, in consideration of an agreement with her husband as to the custody of a minor child and to the disposition of his property, agreed not to oppose his suit for divorce, an interlocutory judgment of divorce should be set aside, being based on collusive agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 533–542, 546, 548; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

3. Divorce (§ 151*) — Judgment — Relief from—"New Trial."

Where the defendant in a divorce suit filed an answer admitting the allegations of the complaint, her remedy to set aside an interlocutory judgment for plaintiff is under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing relief from judgments obtained through excusable neglect, and not by a motion for new trial, for that motion is to obtain a review of issues already tried.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, New Trial.]

4. Divorce (§ 160*)—Actions—Judgment.

Though the defendant in a divorce action defaults, judgment cannot be granted until the facts upon which the relief is sought are established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 521; Dec. Dig. § 160.*]

5. Divorce (§ 161*) — Actions — Judgment—Setting Aside.

A default judgment of divorce will be set aside on slight showing, for the state is also interested, being concerned with the preservation of the marriage relation.

6. Divorce (§ 11*)— Proceedings — Parties Interested.

The state is interested in divorce proceedings, being concerned with the preservation of the marriage relation.

7. Divorce (§ 165*)—Judgment—Vacation.

Where the defendant wife, who filed an answer and cross-bill, withdrew her answer and filed another admitting the allegations of the complaint, the court, on motion to set aside an interlocutory judgment, may consider that the cross-bill was not denied, although the fact that the cause was not at issue is not usually ground for the vacation of a judgment.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Herman E. Rehfuss against Elizabeth A. Rehfuss. From an order setting aside an interlocutory judgment of divorce, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Austin Lewis, of San Francisco, and R. M. Royce, of Oakland, for appellant. Stafford & Stafford, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, C. J. Plaintiff brought an action against defendant for divorce, on the ground of extreme cruelty. Defendant answered, denying specifically the acts of cruelty alleged against her. With her answer she filed a cross-complaint charging plaintiff with extreme cruelty and praying for a divorce from him. No answer to the cross-complaint was ever filed. After filing her original answer and cross-complaint, the defendant filed an amended answer in which she admitted all of the averments of the plaintiff's complaint. Thereafter the case was tried. At the trial the defendant appeared in person. Her attorney was not present, and she was not called upon to testify. Plaintiff's attorney testified to the fact of plaintiff's residence for the requisite length of time in California and in the county wherein the action was brought. Plaintiff, the only other witness, testified that on one occasion defendant fired a shot at him from a pistol, with intent to kill. He testified to no other act of cruelty. The testimony as to the shooting was not corroborated. In her original answer, referring to the shooting, the defendant alleged that on a certain occasion she "discharged a pistol near plaintiff, but not at him or with intent to kill or injure him, but merely to frighten him, shortly after he had cursed and sworn at defendant and called her vile and low names, and after plaintiff had badly beaten, hurt, and badly injured defendant." At the trial no reference was made to defendant's cross-complaint on file. On the testimony of plaintiff and his attorney the court granted an interlocutory judgment, adjudging that he was entitled to a divorce and awarding him the custody of the minor child of the parties, aged two years. After judgment the defendant employed other attorneys to represent her in place of her original attorney. Through her substituted attorneys she moved the court, within four months after the trial, to set aside the judgment taken against her, upon the following grounds: (1) That the judgment was taken against her by reason of her mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect; (2) that the cause was not at issue at the time of trial. In her affidavit used upon the motion, defendant alleged that the denials and averments contained in her answer and cross-complaint are true, and averred that "she reiterates the averments and statements contained in her answer and said cross-complaint." She further deposed that it was her intention to contest plaintiff's application for a divorce; that in pursuance of her intention she filed her answer and cross-complaint; that on June 19, 1911, her attorney then representing her advised her to sign an amended answer admitting the truth of all of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, although the same were untrue; that she "was solely induced to sign said amended complaint (answer) on the advice of her said attorney, who told her that if she contested said action the court would award the custody of the only child of plaintiff and said defendant, namely, Herman E. Rehfuss, Jr., to some public institution, and that the care and custody of said child would be taken from both plaintiff and defendant; * * * that she was deeply attached to said child and interested in its welfare, and moved solely by love for said child she consented to sign said so-called amended answer." In her affidavit she stated that her attorney advised her that if the child were awarded to the plaintiff she would be permitted to see the child and "have him more or less in her care," and if the child were placed in some public institution she would not have such right or privilege; that she appeared at the trial at the request of plaintiff, who told her that "the judge might want to see her and ask some questions." She also stated in her affidavit that "her husband had told her that if she contested said action her child would be taken from him and her and given to some public institution." One of plaintiff's attorneys in an affidavit used in opposition to the motion averred that notice of the time and place of trial had been given to the defendant; that her attorney, upon whom the notice had been served, "stated that he would not be present at said trial, as there were no issues, but that defendant should be present; * * * that on the 31st of May defendant's attorney wrote to affiant a letter in which he stated: 'I will file a withdrawal of Mrs. Rehfuss' answer, so you can serve me with notice of trial and I will not appear.'" He further deposed in his affidavit that on the 19th day of June, 1911, he received from defendant's attorney another letter in which the latter stated:

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "I have to-day had Mrs. Rehfuss verify the amended answer and filed it. You stated when I last saw you that you would have Mr. Rehfuss sign the agreement regarding the custody of the child and file it. Would you kindly let me know when you do file same. I hope you will now have the matter set for trial and would deem it a favor if you would notify me of the result of the court's decision."

In an affidavit by defendant's former attorney, filed in opposition to the motion, he denied that he had given the advice or made the statements alleged in defendant's affidavit to have been given and made. He alleged in his affidavit that pending the action the parties arrived at an agreement concerning their property rights and the custody of their child; that this agreement was the result of a meeting of the parties and their attorneys in the office of the attorneys for the plaintiff; that pursuant to this agreement the plaintiff executed and delivered to his wife a quitclaim deed conveying to her certain real property in dispute between them; and that the defendant on her part in consideration of the deed, executed an agreement relinquishing to the husband her right to the custody of the child; that when the defendant received the deed she instructed her attorney to withdraw her answer and cross-complaint and said to him, "Let him (referring to her husband) go ahead now and get his divorce." He further deposed, using his own language, "that the defendant instructed me immediately after the said meeting of the said parties in Mr. Austin Lewis' office, that after all documents were executed carrying out the terms therein agreed upon that I was to then file a withdrawal of the answer and cross-complaint filed therein by the defendant, and the plaintiff was to proceed with the divorce as he thought fit"; that on June 13th he called upon plaintiff's attorneys "with a view to filing a withdrawal of the answer and cross-complaint"; that one of the plaintiff's attorneys in the interview "suggested that it would be better for the court records if the defendant were to file an amended answer admitting the charges in the complaint." He further stated in his affidavit:

> "The next day I consulted with the defendant and she remarked that she was agreeable to signing this (amended answer), as she wanted him now to go ahead and get his divorce; that she was well satisfied with the matters as I had arranged them for her."

Plaintiff himself filed no affidavit in response to that of defendant, nor did he testify at the hearing of the motion, although oral testimony was then taken.

[1-4] The failure of plaintiff to deny the averments of defendant's affidavit that he "had told her that if she contested said action her child would be taken from him and her and given to some public institution" warranted the court in believing that the plaintiff had made such representations to her. The record before us shows beyond doubt that the interlocutory judgment was taken against defendant through her excusable neglect or through a collusive agreement entered into between the parties. In either event, the judgment was properly set aside. Upon the showing made by the defendant, if the court believed the declarations contained in her affidavit, the court was justified in holding that her failure to defend the action was due to her excusable neglect, induced by fear that, if she did defend, her infant child would be taken from her and its father and placed in some public institution. This fear was engendered in her, according to her sworn statement, by the representations made to her by her husband and her own attorney. Her neglect, under the circumstances detailed in her affidavit, was excusable in law.

Section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

> "The court may, * * * in its discretion, * * * relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect."

The defendant was entitled to relief under this section. Her remedy could not be by motion for a new trial. Her original answer was superseded by her amended answer, which admitted all of the allegations of the complaint and raised no issue of fact. No issue of fact having been raised or tried, defendant had no right to move for a new trial, as a new trial is a re-examination of issues already tried.

In a divorce action, "whether the defendant suffered default or not, the relief shall not be granted until the facts upon which it is sought are established by proof. In such an instance, however, as in any other where the defendant makes default and suffers judgment upon a mere ex parte showing, his remedy in seeking relief from the judgment is in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and not upon motion for a new trial." Foley v. Foley, 120 Cal. 33–37, 52 Pac. 122, 123 (65 Am. St. Rep. 147).

If the trial court disbelieved the statements made by defendant in her affidavit and her oral testimony given at the hearing of the motion, and accepted as true the allegations of the affiants contained in their affidavits used in opposition to the motion, the court was bound to vacate the interlocutory judgment on the ground of collusion between the parties. In Mulkey v. Mulkey, 100 Cal. 91, 34 Pac. 621, an action for divorce, the defendant moved to set aside a default judgment. The motion was denied and the defendant appealed. In reversing the order denying the motion the court said:

> "The facts stated in the affidavit of defendant show either collusion between the parties, or that the defendant was grossly misled and deceived by her husband. * * * In either case the court should have been prompt to set aside the judgment and to allow the defendant to answer, so that the case might be heard and determined on its merits."

[5, 6] The rules of practice applicable to divorce actions differ in many respects from those which govern other actions. In an action for divorce, upon very slight showing the court will set aside a default, if application for relief be made in due time. And although in other actions a party seeking relief from default must support his motion by an affidavit of merits, no such affidavit is required on motion to set aside the judgment in an action for divorce. The law is at all times very solicitous to preserve the integrity of the marriage relation. That relation is the basis of the family, the foundation of society. It cannot be destroyed by the mere consent, whim, or caprice of the parties to the marriage, nor can it be stipulated away in judicial proceedings. The relation can be dissolved only by consent of the state, and upon statutory grounds, presented in good faith to a court of competent jurisdiction. An action for divorce concerns not only the parties immediately interested, but also the state. The attorneys in the case represent the respective parties—the court in a sense represents the state. It is the duty of the court, representing the state, in accordance with the letter and policy of the law, to guard strictly against fraud, collusion, or imposition when the husband or wife seeks to dissolve the bonds that bind them together. As well said by the Supreme Court of Connecticut in Allen v. Allen, 73 Conn. 54, 46 Atl. 242, 49 L. R. A. 142, 84 Am. St. Rep. 135:

> "When an attempt is made through the courts to undo a marriage, the state becomes in a sense a party to the proceedings, not necessarily to oppose, but to make sure that the attempt will not prevail without sufficient and lawful cause shown by the real facts of the case, nor unless those conditions are found to exist at the time the decree is made upon which the state permits a divorce to be granted. The state has an interest in the maintenance of the marriage tie, which neither the collusion nor the negligence of the parties can impair."

Where it becomes manifest to the court, before it loses jurisdiction of the case, that a judgment decreeing a divorce has been obtained by collusive agreement between the parties, or through fraud practiced upon the court, the court has the inherent power to set aside the judgment. This it may do on its own motion. McIntyre v. McIntyre, 9 Misc. Rep. 252, 30 N. Y. Supp. 200; Welch v. Welch, 16 Ark. 527; 2 Nelson on Marr. & Div. § 1050; Edson v. Edson, 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393; Earle v. Earle, 91 Ind. 27; Johnson v. Coleman et al., 23 Wis. 452, 99 Am. Dec. 193; Allen v. Maclellan, 12 Pa. 328, 51 Am. Dec. 608; Boyd's Appeal, 38 Pa. 241; Adams v. Adams, 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134; Graham v. Graham, 54 Wash. 70, 102 Pac. 891, 18 Ann. Cas. 999; Rush v. Rush, 46 Iowa, 648, 26 Am. Rep. 179.

[7] One of the grounds of defendant's motion was that the cause was not at issue at the time the interlocutory judgment was rendered. Although ordinarily this ground would not be sufficient to warrant the court in setting aside a judgment, yet the court had a right to take into consideration, in passing upon the motion to vacate the judgment, the fact that there was an unanswered cross-complaint of defendant on file containing allegations which, if true, should prevent the plaintiff from obtaining a divorce.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1915. Rehearing Denied Feb. 4, 1915.)

1. Carriers (§ 318*)—Personal Injury—Sufficiency of Evidence—Invitation to Leave Car.

In an action for the death of plaintiffs' son, evidence held to warrant a finding that he left the car and walked back over the track to the station upon the express or the implied invitation of defendant's conductor.

2. Carriers (§ 303*)—Duty to Passengers—Setting Down Passenger.

A carrier owes to a passenger the duty of safely delivering him at his destination, and, when the passenger is carried beyond his station and is directed by the conductor to alight, must provide him with a safe means of return to the station; and the relation of carrier and passenger does not terminate until the passenger has had a reasonable opportunity of leaving the carrier's premises.

3. Carriers (§ 347*)—Personal Injuries—Question for Jury—Contributory Negligence.

On evidence in an action for the death of plaintiffs' son, who was carried by his station and then invited to leave the car and walk back over the track to the station, and who was killed by the backing train, his contributory negligence was for the jury.

In such action, where a witness for defendant, whose testimony was of slight bearing on the cause of death, testified that deceased had taken three or four drinks, but refused to state that he was drunk, and where plaintiffs' cross-examination undertook to show that the witness had been influenced in favor of defendant by reason of his relations with defendant, the exclusion of an explanation offered to sustain the credit of the witness, if erroneous, was not reversible error.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by George Miller and wife against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and, from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

J. W. McKinley, Frank Karr, A. W. Ashburn, Jr., and R. C. Gortner, all of Los Angeles, and Leonard & Surr, of San Bernardino, for appellant. Willis & Guthrie, John Brown, Jr., and Daley & Byrne, all of San Bernardino, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages for the death of their son, George E. Miller, who, it was claimed, was killed through the negligent acts of the defendant's servants. There was a verdict and judgment for $7,500 in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The main contention of the appellant is that the evidence did not support the findings, implied in the verdict of the jury, that the defendant was guilty of negligence proximately causing George E. Miller's injuries and death, and that said George E. Miller was himself free from contributory negligence.

The defendant operated a line of electric railway from the city of San Bernardino to the town of Highland. One of the points on the line was Harlem Springs, where the defendant maintained a regular station for receiving and discharging passengers. Coming from San Bernardino, the track, as it approached Harlem Springs, ran in a northeasterly direction. At the station there was a platform and a covered shed or pavilion. Beginning about 40 feet beyond the end of the platform, a bridge or trestle, about 80 feet in length, carried the track over a depression some few feet in depth.

On the night of December 26, 1911, at about 10 o'clock, George E. Miller (whom we shall in this opinion call "Miller") took passage at San Bernardino upon a car of defendant bound for Highland and intermediate points. He had a ticket for Harlem Springs, and, during the progress of the journey, presented his ticket to the conductor. There were other passengers desiring to alight at Harlem Springs, but the conductor, through an oversight, omitted to signal for a stop at that point until the car was opposite the station. The motorman ran on until he had crossed the trestle and then brought the car to a standstill. As the car passed Harlem Springs station, Miller, who had been sitting in the open section at the rear of the car, arose and took a position on or near the steps. The conductor told him not to get off the car until it stopped. Miller left the car after it had crossed the trestle, and started to walk along the track toward the station. (The railroad ran upon its private right of way, and not on a public highway.) Meanwhile the conductor had notified other passengers that the car would return to the station, and he gave the signal to back. The motorman, remaining at his post at the front of the car, reversed the power and started the car backward toward the station. When the car had gone a part of the way over the trestle, it struck Miller and killed him. The conductor did not see Miller on the track until the car was almost upon him, and the signal to stop, which he then gave, was too late.

[1] The instructions presented the case to the jury upon the theory, briefly stated, that the defendant was not liable unless Miller left the car and returned over the track toward the station upon the invitation, express or implied, of the conductor, and unless, further, he was struck while in the exercise of due care in consequence of the negligent act of the conductor in running the car back upon him without proper warning and in disregard of the action taken by Miller in reliance upon the said invitation. The defendant insists that the evidence did not warrant a finding of the invitation referred to in the instructions. But this position is not tenable on the record. There was evidence that the night was dark, cold, and stormy. The ground under the trestle was wet and swampy. The most direct and convenient way of returning to the station was along the track. Any other course would have involved a long detour through private property and across wire fences. The warning not to leave the car until it stopped might very reasonably have been understood by Miller and by the jury to carry with it an affirmative authorization to alight when the car should stop. And, under the circumstances above detailed, it was well within the province of the jury to infer that an invitation to leave the car on the further side of the bridge was an invitation to the passenger to return to the station by way of the railroad track. The appellant's arguments on this point are, to a great extent, based upon a view of the evidence which the jury, by its verdict, rejected. Thus, it is claimed that Miller left the car before it stopped, or after the conductor had announced, in his hearing, that the car would be backed to the station. But there was testimony, which the jury apparently accepted, to the effect that Miller got off the car just after it stopped, and that the conductor's announcement regarding the backing was not made until after Miller had alighted and disappeared into the night.

[2] The authorities are clear to the point that a carrier owes to a passenger the duty of safely delivering him at his destination, and that the relation of carrier and passenger does not terminate until the passenger has had a reasonable opportunity of leaving the carrier's premises. Melton v. Birmingham Ry. Co., 153 Ala. 95, 45 South. 151, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 467; Burke v. C. & N. Ry. Co., 108 Ill. App. 565; Glenn v. Lake Erie, etc., R. R. Co. (Ind. App.) 73 N. E. 861; Texas, etc., Ry. Co. v. Dick, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 256, 63 S. W. 895. When the passenger is carried beyond his station, and is directed by the conductor to alight, the carrier owes him the duty of providing him with a safe means of return to the station. Nellis on Street Railways (2d Ed.) § 326; Kentucky Ry. Co. v. Buckler, 125 Ky. 24, 100 S. W. 328, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 555, 128 Am. St. Rep. 234; N. Y. C. & St. L. Ry. v. Doane, 115 Ind. 435, 17 N. E. 913, 1 L. R. A. 157, 7 Am. St. Rep. 451; Adams v. Mo. P. Ry. Co., 100 Mo. 555, 12 S. W. 637, 13 S. W. 509. The cases cited by appellant are not in conflict with these views. In C. H. & I. R. Co. v. Carper, 112 Ind. 26, 13 N. E. 122, 14 N. E. 352, 2 Am. St. Rep. 144, the injured person was on the wrong train, having boarded it by his own mistake. It was held that the conductor was not acting within the scope of his authority in directing the mode of return to the station. A similar situation was presented in Finnegan v. Chic., etc., Ry. Co., 48 Minn. 378, 51 N. W. 122, 15 L. R. A. 399. In State v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 58 Me. 176, 4 Am. Rep. 258, as in Buckley v. Old Colony R. Co., 161 Mass. 26, 36 N. E. 583, there was no invitation to alight; the passenger knowing that the train had not been stopped for that purpose. Our own decision in Benson v. C. P. R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 45, 32 Pac. 809, 33 Pac. 206, does not aid the appellant. There the passenger had disembarked at the station next after the one for which she was bound, and had received injuries in walking back along the track. A verdict in favor of the carrier was sustained, the court basing its ruling upon the ground that the passenger had been left in a place of safety and was not called upon to return to her destination by way of the railroad track. The case of N. Y. Ry. Co. v. Doane, supra, is distinguished on this ground, the court citing with approval the declaration found in section 617 of Hutchinson on Carriers, that:

> "Where the passenger is carried past the platform, or usual alighting place, and is required either expressly or impliedly to leave the car without assistance, and to find his way unaided to the station, during which time he receives injury, the carrier is liable."

[3] The appellant contends that, even if it be granted that Miller was upon the trestle by defendant's invitation, he was still, as matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence. We cannot agree with this claim. According to the finding of the jury, he was rightfully on the track, having started to walk to the station at the conductor's suggestion and without any knowledge that the car was to be backed. The conductor signaled the motorman to back by sounding three bells. But it is not clear that Miller was then in a position to have heard this signal, nor is there any evidence that he knew what it meant if he did hear it. He was on the trestle when the car came near him, and it was clearly for the jury to say whether he should have become aware of its approach sooner and whether he then acted as a reasonably prudent man would act under the circumstances.

[4] The appellant assigns as error the action of the court in sustaining objections to certain testimony offered by defendant with a view to sustaining the credit of one of its witnesses. This witness had given testimony, which was, in fact, of slight moment. He knew little or nothing of the material facts bearing directly upon the cause of Miller's death, but had testified that, in the course of the evening, Miller had taken three or four drinks. He expressly refused to state, however, that Miller was drunk. The plaintiffs, in cross-examination, sought to show that the witness was biased in favor of the defendant. This was done by questioning him regarding a dance hall leased to him by the defendant. He was also asked whether he had not recently acquired an automobile. To meet this line of testimony, the defendant undertook to go into the particulars of the lease, and to show just how the automobile had been acquired. The court sustained objections to questions directed to this end. Without going into a technical consideration of the admissibility of the proposed evidence, we think the rulings, if erroneous, are not to be regarded as substantially prejudicial. Whether the witness might have been influenced in favor of defendant by his business dealings with it, or whether those dealings enabled him to acquire an automobile, had a very remote and indirect bearing on any issue in the case. The testimony given by the witness in chief was of such slight value that the verdict could hardly have been influenced by it one way or the other. Certainly a reversal would not be justified by the fact that an attempted impairment of the force of this testimony had not been overcome, even if defendant was entitled to overcome it.

Similar reasons preclude favorable consideration of the objections based on the attempt to impeach the same witness by proof of a conversation in which he referred to the receipt of a letter from the railroad company.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

WESTINGHOUSE ELECTRIC & MFG. CO. v. CHAMBERS, State Controller.

(S. F. 7011.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 8, 1915.)

1. STATES (§ 213*)—CLAIMS AGAINST STATE—JUDGMENT—PAYMENT.

A judgment against a state, in cases wherein the state has permitted an action to be maintained against it, merely liquidates and establishes the claim, and, without an express statutory provision, cannot be collected by execution against the state or its property or by any of the ordinary processes of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 201; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

2. STATES (§ 130*)—NECESSITY OF APPROPRIATION—REFUNDMENT OF TAXES PAID.

Pol. Code, § 3669, provides that corporation taxes shall be paid to the state treasurer "as other moneys are required to be paid into the treasury," and if the corporation is aggrieved it may bring an action against the treasurer, and the controller shall draw his warrant for the payment of any final judgment rendered in such action. Section 454 provides that payments to the state treasurer shall go into the general fund unless otherwise provided by law. Held, that section 3669 is violative of Const. art. 4, § 22, providing that no money shall be drawn from the treasury except on appropriation by law, since the statute contemplated a payment of money from the general fund without an appropriation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 107*)—APPROPRIATION BILL—SEVERAL ITEMS.

Const. art. 4, § 29, provides that the general appropriation bill shall be confined to state salaries and expenses of the state government. Section 34 provides that appropriation bills other than the general appropriation bill shall not contain more than one item of appropriation for a single and certain purpose. Held, that Pol. Code, § 3669, is violative of Const. art. 4, § 34, since, if such section 3669 can be considered an appropriation bill, it is not limited to a single and certain item, as many and different judgments may be paid thereunder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 121–134; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

4. STATES (§ 130*) — PAYMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS—NECESSITY OF APPROPRIATION — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 13, § 14g, providing that injunction shall not lie to restrain the collection of taxes, but that an action may be maintained "to recover" taxes illegally collected, does not abrogate Const. art. 4, § 22, forbidding the payment of state money without an appropriation, and hence the provision of Pol. Code, § 3669, directing the state treasurer to pay warrants drawn by the controller for the payment of judgments for taxes illegally collected without an appropriation, is unconstitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

5. STATUTES (§ 105*) — TITLES OF ACTS — APPROPRIATION.

Const. art. 13, § 14g, does not abrogate Const. art. 4, § 34, providing that appropriation bills other than the general appropriation bill shall be confined to a single item for a single and certain purpose, and hence Pol. Code, § 3669, authorizing the payment of judgments against the state for taxes illegally collected without an appropriation, is not thereby taken out of the operation of such section 34 of the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 117, 118; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

6. STATES (§ 191*)—LIABILITY TO SUIT—STATUTES IN DEROGATION OF SOVEREIGNTY.

Public rights will not be treated as relinquished or conveyed away by inference or construction, and statutes permitting the state to be sued are in derogation of its sovereignty and will be strictly construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. §§ 179–184; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

7. TAXATION (§ 543*) — RECOVERY OF TAXES PAID — CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

In view of their legislative history, Pol. Code, §§ 3664–3670, relating to assessment of property, and to the recovery of taxes illegally collected, apply exclusively to taxes therein provided for under the former system of railroad taxation, and Act April 1, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 530), enacted to carry into effect Const. art. 13, § 14, as amended November 8, 1910, allowing payment of taxes under protest and an action to recover taxes illegally collected in the manner then or thereafter provided, applies exclusively to taxes levied and collected under the constitutional amendment, and covers the entire legislation applicable to recovery of such taxes by action.

In Bank. Application for writ of mandate by the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company against John S. Chambers, State Controller. Application denied.

J. C. Campbell and Weaver, Shelton & Levy, all of San Francisco, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Raymond Benjamin, Chief Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent. Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, as amicus curiæ.

SHAW, J. Mandamus to compel the state controller to issue a warrant in favor of the plaintiff on the state treasury for the amount of a judgment recovered by the plaintiff against the state of California in an action to recover state taxes illegally collected.

The plaintiff was a foreign corporation doing business in this state. Subdivision "d" of section 14, art. 13, of the Constitution, provides that the franchises of all corporations, other than those engaged in certain public service, insurance, or banking, shall be valued, in a manner to be provided by statute, and taxed at the rate of one per centum each year on such value. This section was added to article 13 by an amendment adopted in November, 1910. Section 14 of the act of 1911, passed to carry out this provision (Stats. 1911, 530), prescribes the method of valuation. Under these laws, the plaintiff was regularly taxed in the sum of $2,700 as one per centum of the value of its franchise to do business in this state. This business consisted entirely of interstate commerce. For this reason it claimed exemption from this tax, and upon that claim it paid the tax under protest and thereupon brought suit to recover the amount paid and obtained the judgment in question. This judgment has become final. With its merits we have nothing to do, our concern in this proceeding being wholly upon the question of the mode of obtaining payment from the state.

[1] The general rule is well established that a judgment against the state, in cases wherein the state has permitted actions to be maintained against it, merely liquidates and establishes the claim against the state, and that, in the absence of an express statute so providing, such judgment cannot be collected by execution against the state or its property, or by any of the ordinary processes of law provided for the enforcement of judgments; it remains for the state, after such judgment, to provide for the payment thereof in such manner as it sees fit, or to refuse to do so at its pleasure, and the judgment creditor can obtain payment in no other way than that provided. Sharp v. Contra Costa County, 34 Cal. 291; Smith v. Broderick, 107 Cal. 650, 40 Pac. 1033, 48 Am. St. Rep. 167; Gilman v. Contra Costa County, 8 Cal. 57, 68 Am. Dec. 290; Emeric v. Gilman, 10 Cal. 404, 410, 70 Am. Dec. 742; 68 Am. Dec. 297, note; People v. San Joaquin, etc., Ass'n, 151 Cal. 806, 91 Pac. 740.

[2] The petitioner claims that a provision for the payment of this judgment and for the issuance of the warrant therefor is made by section 3669 of the Political Code as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 823). The material parts of the section are as follows:

> "Each corporation, person or association assessed by the state board of equalization must pay to the state treasurer, upon the order of the controller, as other moneys are required to be paid into the treasury, the state and county and city and county taxes each year levied upon the property so assessed to it or him by said board. Any corporation, person or association dissatisfied with the assessment made by the board, upon the payment of the taxes due upon the assessment complained of, * * * and the filing of notice with the controller of an intention to begin an action, may, * * * bring an action against the state treasurer for the recovery of the amount of taxes and percentage so paid to the treasurer, or any part thereof. * * * When any person, corporation or association has made payment of any of the taxes, * * * herein referred to, which have been subsequently adjudged illegal, and still remain in the hands of the state treasurer, such person, corporation or association shall be entitled to a refund thereof, although the payment of such taxes * * * may not have been under protest, nor a notice filed with the controller, * * * as hereinbefore provided. And in case of failure or refusal by the state treasurer to pay the same to such person, corporation or association upon its demand, an action may be brought against the state treasurer for the recovery of the amount of taxes and percentage so paid to the treasurer or any part thereof. * * * If the final judgment be against the treasurer, upon presentation of a certified copy of such judgment to the controller he shall draw his warrant upon the state treasurer, who must pay to the plaintiff the amount of the taxes so declared to have been illegally collected; and the cost of such action, audited by the board of examiners, must be paid out of any money in the general fund of the treasury, which is hereby appropriated and the controller may demand and receive from the county, or city and county interested, the proportion of such costs."

We have italicized the particular clause which, it is claimed, authorizes the issuance of the warrant to the plaintiff. If this clause is valid, and is applicable to the taxes in question, the warrant should be issued as prayed for. We have reached the conclusion that the clause is both invalid and inapplicable. We proceed to state the reasons.

[3] This provision for the payment of money out of the state treasury is contrary to the specific mandates of the Constitution. Section 22 of article 4 provides that:

> "No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and upon warrants duly drawn thereon by the controller."

Section 34 of the same article is as follows:

> "No bill making an appropriation of money, except the general appropriation bill, shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for one single and certain purpose, to be therein expressed."

Section 3669 opens with the statement that the person assessed must pay the taxes each year levied upon the property assessed to it, to the state treasurer, "as other moneys are required to be paid into the treasury." The suit to be brought for the recovery of taxes illegally collected cannot be begun until after the taxes in controversy have been thus paid into the treasury "as other moneys" are paid in. There is no provision of law appropriating such money to any special fund or requiring it to be kept in a separate account; hence it would go into and be a part of the general fund. Pol. Code, § 454. It would be out of this fund that the money must come to pay the warrant of the controller issued to satisfy the judgment in the action when it became final. Money thus paid into the treasury is not earmarked; it becomes a part of the mass and cannot be distinguished from any other money. It is all subject to payment out of the treasury whenever a warrant on the general fund is presented, under a valid appropriation. There can be no doubt therefore that the money to be paid out under the italicized clause of section 3669 above quoted is money in the state treasury, or that in order to get it out it must be taken from the state treasury. This brings it within the prohibition of section 22 of the Constitution aforesaid; it cannot be drawn out "but in consequence of appropriations made by law," and upon the warrant of the controller, duly drawn. Section 29 of the same article declares that the general appropriation bill shall contain no item or items of appropriation except for state salaries, and expenses of state government and state institutions; hence appropriations for these claims could not be embraced in the general appropriation bill. They must be paid out, if at all, by virtue of a specific appropriation. This means that the authority for such payment must be found in a bill containing only one item of appropriation, for one single and certain purpose therein expressed.

By no stretch of construction can this paragraph of section 3669 be transformed into a specific appropriation bill of the kind described in section 34 of article 4 of the Constitution. This section was first enacted in 1883. It was amended in 1891 and again in 1905. This particular paragraph has been included in it from the beginning. If it has any force at all, therefore, instead of being a bill containing but one item of appropriation and that for one single and certain purpose, it authorizes warrants for different items due to different persons for different years, embracing every final judgment that may have been rendered for such claims in any and every year since the last amendment of the section in 1905, or which may hereafter be rendered. The best that can be said of it in this regard is that it is a general appropriation bill to authorize the payment of all future judgments for such claims. It does not contain but one item of appropriation; it embraces as many items as there may be persons having such claims and obtaining final judgments therefor. These separate claims are not itemized at all. And no specific amount is stated. It has no resemblance to a specific appropriation. It is not payable out of revenues of a specified year; it is a continuing general appropriation of the revenues of each succeeding year, as such claims may arise and are converted into final judgments. It is a kind of legislation that is positively forbidden by the sections of the Constitution above quoted, and it is therefore void.

It is urged that the same objections will apply to the validity of sections 3804 and 3819 of the Political Code, so far as they provide for the refunding by the state of state taxes illegally collected. It is to be observed that these sections do not provide for payments of money out of the state treasury, but only allow deductions to be made from collections of taxes that would otherwise be paid into the state treasury. Whether this distinction will place these provisions without the scope of sections 22 and 34 of the Constitution, or not, is a question upon which we express no opinion. The enactment of these sections can have no proper bearing upon the meaning and effect of the prohibitions in the Constitution concerning payments from the state treasury.

[4, 5] It is claimed, however, that this provision of section 3669 is referred to and practically incorporated into the Constitution itself by subdivision "g" of the aforesaid section 14 of article 13. This subdivision, after declaring that no injunction shall ever issue against the collection of any tax levied under the section, proceeds as follows:

> "But after payment action may be maintained to recover any tax illegally collected in such manner and at such time as may now or hereafter be provided by law."

The argument is that this authorizes an action "to recover" taxes illegally collected under color of the constitutional scheme, that to "recover" a sum of money due is to obtain payment thereof, and, consequently, that this is an express recognition, affirmance, and adoption of the provision of section 3669 and, in effect, a constitutional declaration that an action may be maintained for such taxes, and judgment recovered against the state therefor, and that such judgment when final, shall be paid out of the treasury on warrant drawn thereon by the controller. If this is the meaning of subdivision "g," it supersedes and overrides sections 22 and 34 of article 4 in so far as they involve appropriations of money to satisfy final judgments against the state for taxes illegally collected by the state treasurer and, to that extent, takes from the state its sovereign power to control payments of money from the state treasury.

[6] It is a rule of statutory construction that public rights will not be treated as relinquished or conveyed away by inference or legal construction. 2 Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 568; Mayrhofer v. Board of Education, 89 Cal. 110, 26 Pac. 646, 23 Am. St. Rep. 451; Ruperich v. Baehr, 142 Cal. 193, 75 Pac. 782, and cases first above cited. In pursuance of this rule it has been held that statutes permitting the state to be sued are in derogation of its sovereignty and will be strictly construed. Raymond v. State, 54 Miss. 562, 28 Am. Rep. 382. These rules are applicable to the present case.

The word "recover," when used in connection with actions at law for money, does not necessarily, or even ordinarily, include the actual payment of the money sued for. The Century Dictionary defines its meaning as a law term as follows:

> "To recover damages for a wrong, or for a breach of contract. It does not necessarily imply the actual gain of satisfaction or possession, but ordinarily only the obtaining of judgment therefor."

It is true that in some connections it has been given a broader significance. For example, in Leslie v. York, 112 Ky. 712, 66 S. W. 751, it was held that, in a contract by a litigant to pay his attorneys "one-half they may recover," it meant the actual receipt of the money sued for. But the opinion states that ordinarily the word did not include more than the recovery of judgment for the money. In ordinary usage the phrase "action may be maintained to recover any tax illegally collected," as used in subdivision "g," would not be understood to refer to or include a mode or means of obtaining satisfaction of the judgment to be rendered in such action, or the actual receipt of the money sued for. It was not so used in section 3669. The declaration of that section that "an action may be brought against the state treasurer for the recovery of the amount of taxes," if this were the meaning of the word "recover," would have included the actual payment of the money by the state treasurer and the additional provision for a warrant by the controller would have been unnecessary. The rule of strict construction therefore does not warrant the meaning which the plaintiff here desires to have attributed to the word "recover."

Furthermore, the subdivision itself does not declare that the taxes illegally collected shall be repaid to the taxpayer. Its declaration is that he may maintain an action to recover them. The maintenance of an action to recover money is not ordinarily understood to include the collection of the money after judgment. The presentation of the certified copy of the judgment to the controller, and the issuance of the warrant thereon by him, as provided for in section 3669, were not parts of the proceedings in the action authorized by that section. The action was complete when the judgment became final. Likewise, the action authorized by subdivision "g" would be complete when final judgment was obtained, and there is nothing in that subdivision that can be understood as a declaration concerning the manner of satisfaction of the judgment when recovered. Our conclusion is that subdivision "g" does not continue in force or incorporate the provision of section 3669 for the payment of the money out of the state treasury after final judgment.

[7] Upon a consideration of the history of the legislation which culminated in the enactment of section 3669, we are of the opinion that the provision here invoked has no application to the payment of taxes collected under section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution. Prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, railroad taxes were assessed and collected in each county by the county authorities. That Constitution made a radical change in the manner of collection with respect to railroads operated in more than one county. It provided that the operative property of such railroads should be assessed by the state board of equalization and apportioned to the respective counties in proportion to mileage. Article 13, § 10. In 1880 an act was passed adding sections 3664 and 3665 to the Political Code to carry out this provision of the Constitution. The scheme thus provided was not complete, and in 1883 another statute was passed amending sections 3664 and 3665 and adding new sections from 3666 to 3670, inclusive, embracing substantially the scheme in force at the time the constitutional amendment of 1910 was adopted. Some of these sections were subsequently amended, the last amendment of 3669 being in 1905. This entire statutory provision was enacted to provide for the assessment and collection of railroad taxes in pursuance of the constitutional provision requiring the same to be assessed by the state board of equalization. Section 3666 required the state board to prepare a record of the railway assessments and of the apportionment thereof to the counties and that the same should be transmitted to the state controller. The controller was required to enter the amount of the state and local taxes due upon the whole assessment from each railroad company assessed. Section 3668 specified the time when such taxes should be deemed delinquent and the penalties to be thereupon imposed, and provided further that the state's portion of the taxes collected by the state treasurer should be distributed by the treasurer to the funds entitled thereto and that the portion of each county should be reported to the officers thereof. It was this tax so to be assessed to which the provisions of section 3669 requiring it to be paid to the state treasurer applies. The opening sentence of that section does not in terms specify that it refers to the railroad taxes assessed under the immediately preceding provisions of the Code; but, when taken in connection with those provisions and the subject of the act as originally enacted and subsequently amended, it is clear that it can mean no other tax than the railroad tax therein authorized to be assessed and collected. It is not therefore a general continuing provision made for the purpose of applying to any state tax which might thereafter by any subsequent scheme be imposed upon taxpayers. By the amendment to the Constitution in 1910 providing for a percentage tax upon corporation earnings or capital as a means of raising state revenues an entirely distinct and different scheme was enacted. The old provision for the valuation and assessment of all operative railroad property by the state board of equalization was entirely superseded. The provisions of the law relating to that scheme were by their terms necessarily inapplicable to the new scheme. These provisions of the Code related to the assessment of property and the imposition of a tax according to the valuation thereof. The new constitutional scheme provided for no valuation of property except franchises. It included all public service corporations as well as banking and insurance corporations. In order to supplement this constitutional provision a new act was necessary. To meet this exigency the Legislature passed the aforesaid act of April 1, 1911 (Stats. 1911, 530), entitled:

"An act to carry into effect the provisions of section fourteen of article thirteen of the Constitution of the state of California as said Constitution was amended November 8, 1910, providing for the separation of state from local taxation, and providing for the taxation of public service and other corporations, banks and insurance companies for the benefit of the state, all relating to revenue and taxation."

This act embraces an elaborate scheme covering every detail of the proceedings deemed necessary to carry out the constitutional provision referred to. Section 23 of the act covers the same subject-matter, with respect to the taxes levied under the constitutional plan of taxation, as that covered by section 3669 of the Political Code with respect to taxes collected under the old system of railroad taxation superseded by the Constitution. It provides for payment under protest and an action against the state treasurer for the recovery thereof if the taxes are illegally collected; but it omits any provision for warrants by the controller or payment of the judgment out of the state treasury. The only reasonable conclusion from this legislative history is that the provisions of sections 3664 to 3670, inclusive, of the Political Code were intended to apply and do apply exclusively to taxes therein provided for under the old system of railroad taxation, and that the provisions of the act of April 1, 1911, aforesaid, were intended to and do apply exclusively to taxes levied and collected under the constitutional amendment of 1910, and that the latter act covers the entire legislation applicable to the recovery of such taxes by action. The provisions of the Political Code are therefore inapplicable to taxes levied under the Constitution as supplemented by the act of 1911.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to the warrant which he here seeks. The petition for a writ of mandamus is denied.

A city ordinance, prohibiting the maintenance of certain factories, including stone crushers, within a large district of the city which was sparsely inhabited and which contained 500 acres which were unimproved and practically uninhabited, but permitted them within a much smaller district which was densely inhabited, though by the poorer classes, is unreasonable and void.

Guy Eddie, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Wm. J. Carr, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, C. J. The petitioner was taken into custody by virtue of process issued out of the recorder's court of the city of South Pasadena for alleged violation of ordinance of that city No. 264, adopted in 1908, and certain ordinances amendatory thereof. He seeks discharge on the ground, among others, that the ordinances which he is charged with violating are unreasonable and void. The ordinance divides the city into three districts, numbered 1, 2, and 3. The entire area of South Pasadena comprises approximately 2,200 acres of land. District No. 1 contains 25.25 acres, district No. 2 contains 11.65 acres, and in district No. 3 there are 2,163 acres. District No. 1 embraces the retail business section; district No. 2, known as the "Industrial District," is situate in a populous part of the city. As stated in the petition for the writ, it is "densely surrounded by residences and other buildings on all sides for a distance of many blocks in every direction, and is itself very largely built up." District No. 3 is known as the "Residence District," and, as stipulated in this proceeding by the respective parties, "the greater part of the district is sparsely settled, one area containing 500 acres being unimproved, undeveloped and practically uninhabited."

Section 51B of the ordinance, as amended, reads as follows:

> "It shall be unlawful and is hereby declared to be unlawful for any person, persons, firm or corporation to erect or cause to be erected, maintain or cause to be maintained, occupy or cause to be occupied any factory, warehouse, storehouse, blacksmith shop or horse shoeing shop, livery stable, lumber yard, planing mill, coal yard, hay and feed yard, machine shop, bottling works, brick yard, canning works, carpet cleaning works, railroad shop, power house, feed or flour mill, feed or sales stables, foundry, packing house, ice factory, laundry, oil tank, piano or organ factory, pattern works, stone crusher, rolling mill, fireworks factory, gasworks, moving picture development works, moving picture photographic works or camp, or a place where persons congregate or assemble for the purpose of making and producing moving picture views and scenes, or any manufacturing establishment, or any storage or warehouse business of any kind or character in district No. 3 of said general fire limits."

The ordinance excludes from district No. 1 the buildings, occupations and businesses prohibited in district No. 3 but inferentially permits them in district No. 2. Presumably the stone crusher is included in the list mentioned in the section by reason of the noise and dust which usually result from its operation. The petitioner at the time of his arrest maintained and operated in district No. 3 a stone crusher, in plain violation of the provisions of section 51B. The plant of the petitioner is situate in the "Arroyo Seco," on the western boundary of the city. The petitioner owns 14 acres in this area. The Arroyo Seco is what is known as a "wash." In the vicinity of the crusher the "wash" is three-quarters of a mile wide. For a distance of approximately one-half a mile on the east side of the "wash" the area consists almost entirely of vacant and unimproved land. There are only four dwellings within a radius of 200 yards from the crusher. As stated in the petition for the writ, the environment in the neighborhood of the stone crusher is made up of a "large area contained in a rugged, rocky, and bushy wash, cut off from the rest of neighborhood by high bluffs." These bluffs range in height from 50 to 100 feet and upward. In the neighborhood and closer to the populous part of the city are several railroads in operation, the Salt Lake operating daily 10 trains, the Santa Fé 20 trains daily and the Pacific Electric (an interurban line) operating a train every 10 minutes. In the dry season the floor of the Arroyo Seco presents the appearance of a desert waste, here and there dotted with cacti and brush. In the rainy season torrential freshets occasionally spread over and cover the entire area. It contains large deposits of sand, gravel and rock which are very valuable for building purposes, particularly so because of the proximity of the market for building materials in the nearby cities. The rock consists of boulders of various sizes which are put through the crusher to reduce them to marketable form. The freshets which occur in the rainy season cause material to take the place of that removed in the dry season, making the supply of rock, sand, and gravel practically inexhaustible. Plaintiff's land has scarcely any value other than that due to the building material found thereon.

Before he applied for a writ of habeas corpus, the petitioner commenced an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county against the city of South Pasadena to enjoin the enforcement against him of the Ordinance No. 264 and amendatory ordinances, on the ground of their alleged illegality. In that action the court adjudged the ordinances valid. By stipulation entered into between the petitioner and respondent the same evidence presented to the superior court upon the hearing of the application for the injunction is considered as evidence in this case. The findings of fact and conclusions of law in the injunction proceeding are also before us as evidence, but they are in no way binding upon this court and will be disregarded in view of the conclusion which we have reached concerning the invalidity of the ordinances. The Chief Justice of the court, in company with counsel for the respective parties, viewed the premises where the stone crusher is located, observed its operation at close range and at different points more or less remote from it. He also visited districts 1 and 2 and observed conditions in and about the same.

After a careful consideration of the evidence in the case we must hold that the ordinances under which the petitioner is being prosecuted, in so far as they relate to the right to maintain and operate a stone crusher in district No. 3, are unreasonable and therefore void. In the injunction suit brought by the petitioner against South Pasadena, the petitioner introduced in evidence affidavits of 19 witnesses, who testified to the conditions surrounding the stone crusher and resulting from its operation. Several of these witnesses testified that the noise and dust produced by the operation of the crusher were not observable at their places of residences. Among the witnesses so testifying for the petitioner were four dairy proprietors who conducted their dairies in the vicinity of the crusher, three at a distance of 300 yards therefrom, and one at a distance of 450 yards. They all deposed that if the amount of dust claimed by the witnesses for the defendant to come from the crusher, emanated therefrom, they would notice it "as the dairy business would be especially sensitive to such an annoyance." The other witnesses for the plaintiff, living at distances varying from 100 to 300 yards from the crusher, deposed that at their respective places of residence they noticed very little, if any, dust or noise.

As is usual in cases of this character there is a decided conflict in the testimony produced by the respective parties. The affidavits of eight witnesses were presented as evidence in favor of the defendant in the injunction suit. Six of these witnesses testified to the offensive character of the dust and noise emanating from the crusher, while in operation; several of them joining in the statement that:

> "The stone crusher maintained on plaintiff's property is injurious to the health of the residents along the bank of the Arroyo Seco by reason of the noise and large amount of dust caused thereby and for like reasons is offensive to the senses of the residents and interferes with the use of property in the vicinity thereof and interferes with the comfortable enjoyment of life and property and is a nuisance."

J. W. Moore, building inspector of South Pasadena, in his affidavit denied that industrial district No. 2 is not suitable for or adapted to the existence or maintenance of businesses prohibited in district No. 3 as claimed by plaintiff. He declared:

> "On the contrary said district (No. 2) is located in the vicinity of railroad tracks and it is immediately surrounded by a poorer class of residences. There are vacant lots in said industrial district on which manufacturing and industrial enterprises may be located."

He further deposed that the crusher by its operation "creates noise and dust so as to seriously impair and destroy the value of lots in the city of South Pasadena along the bank of the Arroyo Seco and in the vicinity of said stone crusher."

[1] Notwithstanding the evidence produced by respondent we deem the ordinances unreasonable and void. As already stated, the only district (No. 2) in which a stone crusher may be maintained contains 11.65 acres situated in the heart of the city and surrounded by residences and other buildings on all sides. While the ordinances permit the maintenance of a stone crusher in this restricted territory surrounded by residences, the same ordinances make it a crime to erect or mantain one in a remote corner of the district No. 3, containing 2,163 acres, a greater part of which is sparsely settled, or to maintain or erect one in the center of an area containing 500 acres in district No. 3 which is admittedly unimproved, undeveloped, and practically uninhabited. Although, as Inspector Moore, in his affidavit says, district No. 2 where the business prohibited in No. 3 may be maintained is "immediately surrounded by a poorer class of residences," the occupants of these residences are entitled in law to as much consideration as those occupying the magnificent residences on the banks of the Arroyo Seco several hundred yards away from the objectionable crusher. The unreasonable restrictions as to the place where a stone crusher may or may not be erected or maintained render the ordinances void.

[2] Concrete has become a very important factor in the construction of improvements in our cities and towns and in the construction of roads and highways. Rock, sand, and gravel and cement are necessary ingredients in concrete construction and must be obtained. The business of producing these materials, if maintainable within the confines of a city or county without becoming a public nuisance or injurious to the health, comfort, safety, or welfare of the inhabitants, cannot, by legislative bodies, be arbitrarily suppressed or interfered with.

[3] The city of South Pasadena, in the exercise of the police power vested in it by our state Constitution, has the undoubted right to regulate the business of operating a stone crusher within the city limits, but such ordinance must be reasonable and must be for the purpose of protecting the public health, comfort, safety, or welfare. As stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 25 Sup. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169:

> "It may be admitted that every intendment is to be made in favor of the lawfulness of the exercise of municipal power, making regulations to promote the public health and safety, and that it is not the province of courts, except in clear cases, to interfere with the exercise of the power reposed by law in municipal corporations for the protection of local rights and the health and welfare of the people in the community. But notwithstanding this general rule of the law, it is now thoroughly well settled by decisions of this court that municipal by-laws and ordinances, and even legislative enactments undertaking to regulate useful business enterprises are subject to investigation in the courts with a view to determining whether the law or ordinance is a lawful exercise of the police power, or whether, under the guise of enforcing police regulations, there has been an unwarranted and arbitrary interference with the constitutional rights to carry on a lawful business, to make contracts, or to use and enjoy property."

In the case now under consideration, it is plainly manifest that the attempted regulation of the business conducted by the petitioner has no relation to the ends for which the police power exists, namely to protect the public health, comfort, safety, or welfare. An ordinance which prevents the operation of a stone crusher in a sparsely settled territory of 2,163 acres, 500 of which are undeveloped and practically uninhabited, and allows its operation in a small area of 11.65 acres in the center of a city surrounded by "poorer classes of residences," does not subserve the ends for which the police power exists.

The ordinances which the petitioner is charged with having violated being void and his arrest being illegal, it is ordered that he be discharged.

C. M. STAUB SHOE CO. v. BYRNE.

(L. A. 3419.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 7, 1915. Rehearing Denied Feb. 4, 1915.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 101*)—PROVISIONS FOR TERMINATION—CONSTRUCTION—"WHOLLY UNFIT FOR OCCUPANCY"—"UNFIT FOR OCCUPANCY."

A lease provided that if the building was destroyed by fire, or partially destroyed so as to render the premises wholly unfit for occupancy, or so badly injured that they could not be repaired within sixty days, the lease should terminate and the lessee should surrender and pay rent only to the time of surrender, and that in case of such destruction or partial destruction the lessor might repossess the premises discharged of the lease, but that, if they could be repaired within 60 days, rent should not run after injury and during repairs, and that the lessor should repair with reasonable speed; that, if the premises were so slightly injured as not to be unfit for occupancy, the lessor should repair with reasonable speed; and that rent should not cease. The premises were damaged by fire and rendered wholly unfit for occupancy, and the tenant, after being excluded from possession, brought action for the value of the term. Civ. Code, § 1641, requires that the whole of a contract be taken together so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable. Held, that "wholly unfit for occupancy" and "unfit for occupancy" were not equivalent, and that if the premises were so damaged as to prevent or greatly interfere with the conduct of the lessee's business, though not requiring him to vacate during repairs, they were "unfit for occupancy," relieving the lessee from rent during repairs, but not terminating the lease; but that, where the premises were so damaged as to be "wholly unfit for occupancy," the lease was terminated, so that the lessee could not recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 314, 315; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 101*)—TERMINATION OF LEASE—FORFEITURE.

Such provision did not declare a forfeiture, because fixing events having no relation to any act or default of the parties upon which the lease should terminate, and hence there was no basis for applying the rule of strict construction prescribed by Civ. Code, § 1442, against conditions involving forfeiture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 314, 315; Dec. Dig. § 101.*)

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 101*)—LEASE—CONSTRUCTION.

A provision in a lease for termination upon damage or destruction by fire, etc., was to be interpreted in the light of the conditions existing when it was made, and not against the lessor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 314, 315; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a lessee's action to recover the value of the use and occupation for the term of a lease found to have been terminated under a provision thereof by damage from fire, error, if any, in admission of evidence as to the time within which the premises could be repaired, was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068, 1069, 4153–4157, 4166; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 213*)—TERMINATION OF LEASE—RIGHT TO RECOVER RENT.

Under a lease providing that upon damage or destruction of the premises the lease should terminate and the lessee should immediately surrender the premises and pay rent only to the time of such surrender, the lessee, who had paid rent in advance for February, during which month the lease terminated by damage or destruction of the premises, could not recover the proportionate rent for the remainder of the month, as the provision was not a covenant to repay rent due and paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 846–848, 850, 852, 854, 856, 857–860; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 231*)—RECOVERY OF RENT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

If such provision entitled the lessee to recover the proportionate part of advance monthly rental, after termination and surrender, the burden of alleging and proving a surrender was on him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 926–934; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by the C. M. Staub Shoe Company against James W. Byrne. Judgment for defendant, and, from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Williams, Goudge & Chandler, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Denis & Loewenthal and O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. On March 9, 1910, Mrs. Margaret Irvine was the owner of a store and office building situated at the northwest corner of Broadway and Third streets in the city of Los Angeles. On that day she executed a lease of the corner store and basement in said building to the plaintiff for the term of five years commencing on the 1st day of January, 1911, at a monthly rental of $1,250, payable in advance on the 1st day of each month. On February 16, 1911, the building and the premises occupied by the plaintiff were damaged and injured by fire. Prior to the last-mentioned date the defendant James W. Byrne had succeeded to the interest of the lessor in the lease. This action is the outgrowth of a controversy arising over certain provisions of the lease relative to the effect of destruction of or injury to the premises by fire or other cause. The plaintiff contended that it was entitled to remain in possession of the store and basement under its lease. The defendant's position was and is that the lease was terminated at the date of the fire, and he has excluded the plaintiff from the possession and leased the premises to another tenant. The action was brought to recover the sum of $45,000 alleged to be the value, at the date of the fire, of the lease and the value of the use and occupation of the premises during the remainder of the term. The complaint also seeks to recover the sum of $580.40, being the proportion of the monthly rent representing the part of the month of February elapsing after the fire. The case was tried without a jury, and judgment went in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The case turns largely upon the construction of the fourth clause of the lease. This clause reads as follows:

> "If, during the term of this lease, the building or premises are destroyed by fire, or other action of the elements, or partially destroyed so as to render the premises demised wholly unfit for occupancy, or if they shall be so badly injured that they cannot be repaired within sixty days after the happening of the injury, then this lease shall cease and become null and void from the date of such damage or destruction, and the lessee shall immediately surrender said premises, and all interests therein, to said lessor, and said lessee shall pay rent within this term only to the time of such surrender; and in case of destruction or partial destruction as above mentioned, the said lessor may re-enter and repossess said premises discharged of this lease, and may remove all parties therefrom; and if said premises shall be repairable within sixty days from happening of said injury, then said rent shall not run or accrue after such injury and while the process of repairs is going on, and the lessor shall repair the same with all reasonable speed, and the rent shall recommence immediately after said repairs shall be completed; but if said premises shall be so slightly injured by fire or the elements as not to be rendered unfit for occupancy, then the said lessor agrees that the same shall be repaired with reasonable promptitude; and in that case the rent accrued and accruing shall not cease or determine. In no case shall the lessee be entitled to compensation or damages on account of any inconvenience or annoyance, or destruction by fire or earthquake or by other actions of the elements or by reconstruction or repair of any portion of said building; nor for any damage to or loss of property in said premises from any cause."

The complaint alleges that the leased premises were repairable and could have been repaired within the period of 60 days after the said 16th day of February, 1911; that the defendant did not repair said premises within said period of 60 days and did not use reasonable or any diligence in that behalf. The answer denies these allegations, and further alleges that the demised premises occupied by plaintiff were destroyed and were rendered by said fire wholly unfit for occupancy. Upon all these issues the findings were in favor of the defendant.

One of the conclusions of law was that, by reason of the fact that the building and premises were partially destroyed by fire so as to render the demised premises wholly unfit for occupancy, said lease became and was terminated. A like conclusion was drawn from the fact that the premises were so badly injured that they were not repairable and could not be repaired within 60 days after the happening of the said injury by fire. The court further concluded that the defendant was entitled under the terms of the lease to retain the sum of $1,250 paid in advance for the month of February, 1911.

With respect to the main cause of action, i. e., that based upon the defendant's refusal to permit the plaintiff to occupy the premises during the remainder of the term, the appellant contends that under a proper construction of the lease the tenancy did not terminate by a mere partial destruction rendering the premises wholly unfit for occupancy, but that such result followed only if the premises were so badly injured that they could not be repaired within 60 days. Unless this position be well taken, the appellant's claim that it was wrongfully ousted from the premises must fail, since it cannot be doubted that the evidence amply warranted the finding that the fire rendered the premises wholly unfit for occupancy. If, on the other hand, the fact so found did not terminate the tenancy, the plaintiff must still overcome the conclusion that the lease ceased by reason of the fact that the premises were not repairable within sixty days. In this regard the appellant contends with great vigor and earnestness that the evidence does not support the finding that the premises could not have been repaired within the time specified.

[1] The first subject of inquiry, then, is the proper interpretation of the clause defining the conditions which may terminate the lease. By the clear and express language of the opening part of this clause, it is provided that the lease shall cease and become null and void upon the occurrence of any one of three contingencies: (1) If "the building or premises are destroyed by fire or other action of the elements"; (2) "if the building or premises are partially destroyed so as to render the premises demised wholly unfit for occupancy"; or (3) "if they shall be so badly injured that they cannot be repaired within sixty days after the happening of the injury." Up to this point the clause is expressed in plain and simple words, and there is no room for the play of rules of interpretation. The appellant contends, however, that the later provisions of the clause so modify and limit the effect of the portion just referred to as to destroy the second contingency outlined and to terminate the lease in the case of partial destruction or injury only in the event that the premises are not repairable within 60 days after the happening of the injury. This claim is based upon the following provision:

> "That if said premises shall be repairable within sixty days from the happening of said injury, then said rent shall not run or accrue after such injury and while the process of repairs is going on and the lessor shall repair the same with all reasonable speed and the rent shall recommence immediately after said repairs shall be completed; but if said premises shall be so slightly injured by fire or the elements as not to be rendered unfit for occupancy, then the said lessor agrees that the same shall be repaired with reasonable promptitude, and in that case the rent accrued or accruing shall not cease or terminate."

The argument is that the provision last quoted obviously contemplates the liability of the lessor to repair and the right of the tenant to continue under his lease in either of two events: (1) If the injury or the necessary repair work be so extensive as to prevent occupancy by the tenant, in which case rent shall be remitted during the time of repair; or (2) if the injury be so slight as not to render the premises unfit for occupancy, in which case the obligation to pay rent shall continue during the period of repair. It being provided therefore that the right of the tenant shall continue even though there be an injury rendering the premises unfit for occupancy, there is presented, it is urged, a conflict between the later and the earlier parts of the clause, and the conflict should be resolved in favor of the tenant by holding that no partial injury shall terminate the lease unless the premises be injured to such an extent that they cannot be repaired within 60 days. The necessary effect of this contention is to deny all meaning to the provision for a termination in the event of a partial destruction rendering the premises demised wholly unfit for occupancy, for, under the construction thus suggested, the only event (short of a total destruction of the building or premises) which would terminate the lease would be an injury not repairable within 60 days—an event which is provided for in separate and distinct terms. It is, of course, unnecessary to cite decisions in support of the fundamental rule of interpretation requiring effect to be given to every part of a contract if reasonably practicable. Civ. Code, § 1641. Unless the later provisions relied on by the appellant are fairly susceptible of no interpretation other than one which will totally destroy an independent provision of the contract, they should not be interpreted in the manner suggested. We are satisfied that it is "reasonably practicable" to give effect to every part of the fourth clause, without doing violence to the intent of the parties as manifested by the language used by them. The opening part of the clause contemplates three different kinds or degrees of destruction or damage: (1) A total destruction (which is not in question here); (2) a partial destruction or damage rendering the premises wholly unfit for occupancy; and (3) an injury which cannot be repaired within 60 days. Since these three situations are stated in terms connected by the disjunctive article "or," the three contingencies specified are to be understood as representing alternatives, each of which operates independently of the other two. An injury which cannot be repaired within 60 days may or may not render the premises wholly unfit for occupancy. But since the lease specifies the two conditions alternatively as events terminating the lease, the natural meaning of the clause is that a damage rendering the premises wholly unfit for occupancy will terminate the lease, regardless of the time necessary for repair, and that an injury that cannot be repaired within 60 days will have the same effect, whether the injury be one that renders the premises wholly unfit for occupancy or not.

There remains a fourth contingency, upon the occurrence of which the lease is not determined, although there has been an injury to the premises, i. e., if the premises are not rendered wholly unfit for occupancy, and if they can be repaired within 60 days. The later clause dealing with the abatement of rent during the period of repair deals with this contingency. The lessor is required to repair with all reasonable speed, and no rent is to be paid during the period of repair unless the injury is so slight that the premises are not rendered unfit for occupancy. This provision does, no doubt, contemplate the possibility of a continuance of the lease even though the premises have been rendered unfit for occupancy. Is there a necessary conflict with the earlier provision for a termination in the event of partial destruction rendering the premises "wholly unfit for occupancy"? We think not. The word "wholly" is not found in the later provision, and we must assume that, in the minds of the parties, this word had some meaning and purpose. "Wholly unfit for occupancy" is not the same thing as "unfit for occupancy." The rational conclusion is that the parties foresaw the possibility of injuries affecting the availability of the premises for occupancy in three different degrees: (1) An injury which would make them totally unfit for occupancy; (2) an injury which would seriously interfere with their enjoyment and occupancy; and (3) one which was so slight as to create virtually no impediment to their occupancy. The premises were to be used, and were used, as a retail shoe store. The parties were contracting with reference to occupancy for such use. The premises might be damaged to such an extent as to prevent or greatly hamper the conduct of business, while not requiring the tenant to vacate while repairs were being made. This would render the premises "unfit for occupancy" within the meaning of the clause relieving the tenant from the payment of rent during the period devoted to repairs, but would not terminate the lease by rendering them "wholly unfit for occupancy."

[2] This construction, as we have already suggested, gives effect to every provision of the contract and does not distort any word or phrase from its fair meaning. So interpreted, the fourth clause makes entirely reasonable provision for the various contingencies that might result in case of fire or other injury to the building or premises. There is here no basis for applying the rule of strict interpretation against conditions involving forfeiture. Civ. Code, § 1442. The clause terminating the lease in certain contingencies does not declare a forfeiture. It fixes events, having no relation to any act or default of the parties, upon which it is agreed that the lease shall end.

[3] The further argument of appellant that the clause should be interpreted against the lessor is equally inapplicable. The meaning of the lease is, of course, to be ascertained in the light of conditions existing when it was made. Whatever it meant then it means now. There is no ground for saying that the provision terminating the lease in the event of damage rendering the premises wholly unfit for occupancy was for the benefit of the lessor rather than the lessee. So far as could be known in advance, it might be highly advantageous to the tenant to be released if the premises should be rendered wholly unfit for occupancy.

The interpretation put by us upon the lease dispenses with the necessity of any inquiry into the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding that the premises were not repairable within sixty days. Nor is it important to examine the finding, also assailed by appellant, that the lessor used reasonable diligence in repairing the premises. Whether the premises could be repaired within a given time, or whether they were repaired diligently or at all, does not concern the appellant if his lease ended on the day of the fire by reason of the fact that the premises had been rendered wholly unfit for occupancy.

[4] It is claimed that the court erred in certain rulings on the admission of evidence, but the evidence involved all bore on the issue of the time within which the premises could have been repaired. If error was committed in any of these rulings, it was not prejudicial.

[5, 6] The only other point raised by appellant is that it should have been given judgment for a portion of the February rent paid by it in advance. The fire occurred on the 16th day of the month. The fire clause, which we have already quoted in full, provided that, upon the occurrence of any of three events, the "lease shall cease and become null and void from the date of such damage or destruction, and the lessee shall immediately surrender said premises, and all interests therein, to the lessor, and said lessee shall pay rent within this term only to the time of such surrender." It is settled in this state that a tenant who has taken possession of the leased premises and paid his rent, or a part of it, in advance, as required by the terms of the lease, cannot, in the absence of any covenant in the lease, recover the rent so paid in case of the destruction of the premises by fire without any fault of either party to the lease. Harvey v. Weisbaum, 159 Cal. 265, 113 Pac. 656, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 540, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1115. And this is true even though, by the terms of the lease, or under a statute, the destruction of the premises terminates the lease. The appellant was not therefore entitled to repayment of a proportion of the February rent unless the lease contained a covenant for such repayment. The appellant relies on the provision that the lessee shall, in certain events, "surrender said premises * * * and said lessee shall pay rent within this term only to the time of such surrender." This is not a covenant to repay, in whole or in part, any installment of rent which had become due and been paid prior to the fire. It merely declares that the tenant shall not be called upon to pay any further rent after surrendering the premises. But, if the language relied on could be given the effect claimed for it, the right to repayment would arise only upon the tenant's surrender of the premises. There is neither allegation, proof, nor finding that the plaintiff surrendered the premises at any time which would entitle it to a refund of any part of the February rent. In any view, the burden was on the plaintiff to allege and prove such surrender.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

POLKINGHORN v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY et al. (L. A. No. 3984.) Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1914.) In Bank. Application by W. P. Polkinghorn for writ of prohibition directed against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Bernardino and another. Ordered that peremptory writ issue. Tyrrell, Abrahams & Brown, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. E. W. Freeman and William B. Ogden, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. 25 Cal. App. 729

PEOPLE v. ZERMAN. (Cr. 551.) (District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Nov. 11, 1914.) Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge. Edward Zerman was convicted of crime, and appeals. Affirmed. Jas. F. Sheehan, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. We are satisfied that the point made in this case in support of the appeal is not well taken, namely, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment. From a reading and consideration of the evidence, we are satisfied that the contrary is the case. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.
